Have ebb'd their fill, their waves do rise again."

Greene: Alphonsus, i.

2. Geol.: Rising; a term applied to the fifth series of the Appalachian strata, synonymous with the Clinton group of New York, and, as shown by fossil echinoderms and trilobites, partially equivalent in age to the Silurian Wenlock formation of England. Maximum thickness about 2,400 feet. (Prof. H. D. Rogers: Geology of Pennsylvania.)

surge'-eôn, *surg-i-en, *surg-en, *surg-eyn, *surg-i-on, s. [A corrupt. of chirurgien (q. v.), from O. Fr. chirurgien, cerurgien.]

1. Ord. Lang.: One who practices surgery; in a more limited sense, one who cures diseases or injuries of the body by operating manually upon the patient. In a more general sense, one whose occupation is to treat diseases or injuries by medical appliances, whether internal or external.

¶ Surgeon-general: In the United States army the chief of the medical department. In the British army a surgeon ranking next below the chief of the medical department.

2. Ichthy.: A popular name for any species of the genus Acanthurus, from the sharp, erectile, lancet-shaped spine with which each side of the tail is armed. In the early stages of their growth these fish are so different from the fully-developed individuals, that for some time the young fish were placed in a separate genus, Acronurus. (See extract.)

"Surgeons occur in all tropical seas, with the exception of the eastern part of the Pacific, where they disappear with the corals. They do not attain to any size, the largest species scarcely exceeding a length of eighteen inches. Many are agreeably or showily colored, the ornamental colors being distributed in very extraordinary patterns. The larger species are eatable, and some even esteemed as food."—Günther: Study of Fishes, p. 439.

1. Science & Hist.: The term includes a science and art, the former relating to the study of accidental injuries and surgical diseases common to the whole or several regions, organs, or textures of the body, and to morbid growths and pathological processes of particular organs or regions, the latter to their treatment by operation.

fâte, fât, färe, amidst, whât, fâll, father; wê, wêt, hêre, camêl, hêr, thêre; pine, pît, sîre, sîr, marine; gô, pôť, or, wôre, wôlf, wôrķ, whô, sôn; mûte, cûb, cûre, unite, cûr, râle, fûll; trÿ, Sÿrian. æ, œ = ê; ey = â. qu = kw.

The Egyptians are said to have practiced the art with success about 410 B. C. Hippocrates mentions a surgical instrument for reducing dislocated bones. Celsus, A. D. 17, was a skillful surgeon. In the third century surgery received an impulse from Erasistratus of Alexandria, who introduced the practice of dissecting the human subject. The Arabians made some progress in the art. The founder of modern surgery is considered to have been Andrew Vesalius (1514-1564). His great work, De Corporis Humani Fabrica Libri Septem, was published at Basel in 1543. The discoveries of Ambrose Paré, John Hunter, and others were followed by the conservative surgery in which so many signal triumphs were achieved by Brodie, Lawrence, Cooper, &c. The introduction of anæsthesia by Sir J. Simpson led to the improved surgical practice of Fergusson, Syme, Paget, and others. Ovariectomy has saved hundreds of lives in the hands of Spencer Wells, Bantock, Keith, and Tait. Antiseptic treatment has been introduced by Sir Joseph Lister, with equally great effect; and Pasteur's inoculation treatment has, it is believed, been carried to success, and will produce the grandest results in preventing disease. The introduction of lithotripsy, the cure of aneurism by pressure, the use of the ophthalmoscope, laryngoscope, thermometer, endoscope, splanchnoscope, sphygmograph, x-rays, antiseptic ligatures &c., with skin-grafting, nerve-stretching, &c., may be mentioned as among the comparatively recent triumphs of modern surgery, rendering operations less terrifying and much more effectual.

"This would soon raise surgery into an art."—Warburton: Divine Legation, bk. iv., § 3.

2. A place where surgical operations are performed, or where medicines are prepared.

sūrg'-ī-ant, a. [Lat. surgo=to rise.]

Surinam-poison, s.

Bot.: Tephrosia toxicaria, a half shrubby erect plant, with many pairs of leaflets, pubescent above and silky beneath; papilionaceous flowers and linear, velvety, mucronate legumes. It is said to have come at first from Africa, but now grows in the West Indies and Guiana, where the leaves, bruised and pounded, are cast into the water to intoxicate and poison fish.

Surinam-toad, s.

Zoöl.: Pipa americana, a large flat toad, found on the edges of swamps in Surinam and the neighboring country. It is about a foot long, with a short, broad, pointed head, the nostrils produced into a leathery tube; large hind limbs with webbed feet; fore feet small, with four slender webbed fingers, terminating in four small projections. Its brownish-olive above, whitish below; the skin is covered with a number of tiny hard granules, interspersed with horny, tubercular projections. It has no tongue, and the jaws and palate are toothless. The species is propagated in an extremely curious manner. When the eggs are laid, the male impregnates them, takes them in his paws, and places them on the back of the female, where they adhere by means of a glutinous secretion, and become by degrees embedded in a series of cells which then form in the skin. When the process is completed, a membrane closes over the cells, and the back of the female bears a strong resemblance to a piece of dark honeycomb. In these cells the eggs are hatched, and the young undergo their metamorphosis, bursting through the protecting membrane as perfect frogs.

Surinam-toad.

sū-rī-nām-īne, s. [Eng. surinam; -ine.]

Chem.: An alkaloid said to occur in the bark of Andira inermis.

3. To yield to any influence, passion, emotion or power. (Often used reflexively.)

"If we do not surrender our wills to the overture of His goodness."—Barrow: Sermons, vol. iii., ser. 4.

*4. To let be taken away; to relinquish, to resign.

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camēl, hēr, thēre; pine, pīt, sīre, sīr, marīne; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rāle, fūll; trȳ. Sȳrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

II. Law: To make surrender of. [SURRENDER, s., II. 2.]

B. Intransitive:

1. Ord. Lang.: To yield; to give one's self up to the power of another.

"Fetch hither Richard, that in common view
He may surrender." Shakesp.: Rich. II., iv. 1.

2. Law: To appear in court in discharge of recognizances or bail entered into; to appear in court under an order of the Court of Bankruptcy.

"At the second of these meetings, at farthest, the bankrupt must surrender; or, in default of doing so, be guilty of a misdemeanor punishable by imprisonment not exceeding three years."—Blackstone: Comment., bk. ii., ch. 27.

sŭr-rĕn'-dĕr, s. [SURRENDER, v.]

1. Ord. Lang.: The act of surrendering; the act of yielding or resigning one's person, or the possession of something, into the power or control of another; a yielding, a giving; especially, the yielding of an army, fort, or the like, to an enemy.

II. Technically:

1. Insurance: The abandonment of an assurance policy by the party assured on receiving back a portion of the premiums paid. The amount payable on the surrender of a policy is called the surrender value, and depends upon the number of years during which the premiums have been paid.

2. Law:

(1) English Law: The yielding up of an estate for life or for years to him that has the immediate estate in reversion or remainder. It may be either in fact or in law. A surrender in fact must be made by deed, which is the allowable evidence. A surrender in law is one which may be implied, and generally has reference to estates or tenancies from year to year, &c.

"A surrender, sursumreddito, or rendering up, is of a nature directly opposite to a release; for as that operates by the greater estates descending upon the less, a surrender is the falling of a less estate into a greater. There may also be surrender in law by the acceptance by the tenant of a new estate inconsistent with his prior estate. Thus a new lease made to a person in possession under an old lease, and accepted by him, operates as a surrender in law of the old one; for from such acceptance the law implies his intention to yield up the estate which he had before, though he may not by express words of surrender have declared as much."—Blackstone: Comment., bk. ii., ch. 17.

(2) The appearance of a bankrupt in court for public examination.

"The next proceeding, in case an adjudication is made, is the surrender of the bankrupt, and his examination; the appointment of creditors' assignees, and the proof of debts against the estate."—Blackstone: Comment., bk. ii., ch. 27.

(3) The giving up of a principal into lawful custody by his bail.

(4) The delivery up of fugitives from justice by a foreign state; extradition.

¶ Surrender of copyholds:

Law: The yielding up of the estate by the tenant into the hands of the lord, for such purpose as in the surrender are expressed.

sŭr-rĕn'-dĕr-ĕĕ', s. [Eng. surrender; -ee.]

Law: A person to whom the owner grants surrendered land; one to whom a surrender is made.

"Immediately upon such surrender, in court, or upon presentment of a surrender made out of court, the lord by his steward grants the same land again to cestui que use, who is sometimes called the surrenderee, to hold by the ancient rents and customary services; and thereupon admits him tenant to the copyhold, according to the form and effect of the surrender which must be exactly pursued."—Blackstone: Comment., bk. ii., ch. 19.

sŭr-rĕn'-dĕr-or, s. [Eng. surrender; -or.]

Law: One who surrenders an estate into the hands of the owner; one who makes a surrender.

sŭr-rĕn'-drŭ, s. [Eng. surrender; -y.] The act of surrendering; a surrender.

"The declaration and surveyal of those respects according to which Christ is represented the Savior of men."—Barrow: Sermons, vol. iii., ser. 39.

sūr-vēy'-aŋce, subst. [SURVEANCE.] Survey, inspection.

sūr-vēy'-lŋg, pr. par., a. & s. [SURVEY, v.]

A. & B. As pres. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As subst.: The act or art of determining the boundaries, form, area, position, contour, &c., of any portion of the earth's surface, tract of country, coast, &c., by means of measurements taken on the spot; the art of determining the form, area, surface, contour, &c., of any portion of the earth's surface, and delineating it accurately on a map or plan.

¶ 1. Land surveying is the art of applying the principles of geometry and trigonometry to the measurement of land. The principal operations are laying down or driving baselines, and triangles on either side of the base. In large surveys it is desirable to lay down these triangles by measuring each angle with an instrument called the theodolite (q. v.), by which the accuracy of the measurement of the sides may be checked.

2. Geodesic surveying comprises all the operations of surveying carried on under the supposition that the earth is spheroidal. It embraces marine surveying (q. v.).

3. Marine or hydrographical surveying ascertains the forms of coast-lines, harbors, &c., and of objects on the shore, the entrances to harbors, channels, their depth, width, &c., the position of shoals, the depth of water thereon; and it embraces all the operations necessary to a complete determination of the contour of the bottom of a harbor or other sheet of water.

4. Military surveying: [RECONNAISSANCE.]

5. Mining surveying may be either for the purpose of determining the situation and position of the shafts, galleries, and other underground excavations of a mine already in existence; or it may be for determining the proper positions for the shafts, galleries, &c., of a mine not yet opened.

6. Plane surveying: [PLANE-SURVEYING.]

7. Railway surveying is a comprehensive term, embracing surveys intended to ascertain the best line of communication between two given points; it also includes all surveys for the construction of aqueducts for the supply of water to towns, &c.

8. Topographical surveying embraces all the operations incident to finding the contour of a portion of the earth's surface, and the various methods of representing it upon a plane surface. When only a general topographical map of a country is wanted, it is, in general, sufficient to survey the country with reference to its fields, roads, rivers, &c. Levels are run along the principal lines, as fences, roads, &c., and the highest of the most prominent points of the country are determined with respect to some plane of reference. Then the general outlines of the topography are sketched in by the eye; after the general outline is finished, the principal objects worthy of note are represented by a system of conventional signs.

sūr-vēy'-ōr, sūr-vēy'-ēr, sur-vei-or, subst. [Eng. survey, v.; -or.]

*1. An overseer, a superintendent, an inspector.

*2. One who surveys, examines, or inspects for the purpose of ascertaining the condition, quantity, quality, or value of anything; as, a surveyor of roads, a surveyor of shipping, &c.

3. One who surveys or measures land; one skilled in or practicing the art of surveying.

1. Ord. Lang.: The act of surviving or out-living another or others; a living longer than others.

2. Anthrop.: A term introduced by Tylor to denote any process, custom, opinion, &c., which has been carried on by force of habit into a new state of society different from that in which it had its original home, thus remaining as a proof and an example of an older condition of culture out of which a newer has been evolved.

"Among evidences aiding us to trace the course which the civilization of the world has actually followed, is that great class of facts to denote which I have found it convenient to introduce the term 'survivals.' . . . I know an old Somersetshire woman whose handloom dates from the time before the introduction of the 'flying-shuttle,' which new-fangled appliance she has never even learnt to use, and I have seen her throw her shuttle from hand to hand in true classic fashion; this old woman is not a century behind her times, but she is a case of survival. Such examples often lead us back to the habits of hundreds and even thousands of years ago. The ordeal of the key and Bible, still in use, is a survival; the Mid-summer bonfire is a survival; the Breton peasant's All Souls supper for the spirits of the dead is a survival."—Tylor: Prim. Cult. (ed. 1873), i. 16.

¶ Survival of the Fittest:

Biol.: A phrase introduced by Herbert Spencer to signify what Darwin called Natural Selection.

"The preservation during the battle for life of varieties which possess any advantage in structure, constitution, or instinct, I have called Natural Selection; and Mr. Herbert Spencer had well expressed the same idea by the Survival of the Fittest."—Darwin: Variation of Animals and Plants, i. 6.

sūr-vīv'-aŋce, sūr-vīv'-aŋ-çy, s. [English surviv(e); -ance, -ancy.] Survival, survivorship.

sūr-vīve', v. t. & i. [Fr. survivre, from Lat. super-vivo, from super=above, beyond, and vivo=to live.]

A. Transitive:

1. To live longer than; to outlive; to live beyond the life of.

"Christ's soul survived the death of his body; therefore shall the soul of every believer survive the body's death."—Bishop Horsley: Sermons, vol. i., ser. 20.

2. To outlive; to last longer than; to live after.

"His art survived the waters."

Cowper: Task, v. 220.

B. Intrans.: To remain alive; to live after the death of another or others, or after some event has happened.

"Look if your hapless father yet survive."

Dryden: Virgil's Aeneid, ii. 812.

sūr-vīv'-en-çy, s. [English surviv(e); -ency.] Survival.

sūr-vīv'-ēr, s. [English surviv(e); -er.] One who survives or outlives; a survivor.

sūr-vīv'-lŋg, pr. par. & a. [SURVIVE.]

A. As pr. par.: (See the verb.)

B. As adj.: Remaining alive; yet living or existing.

sūr-vīv'-ōr, s. [Eng. surviv(e); -or.]

1. Ord. Lang.: One who lives after the death of another or others, or after some event or time.

"Men, dogs, and horses, all are dead;
He is the sole survivor."

Wordsworth: Simon Lee.

2. Law: The longer lives of two joint tenants, or of any two persons who have a joint interest in anything.

sūr-vīv'-ōr-shīp, s. [Eng. survivor; -ship.]

1. Ord. Lang.: The state of surviving or outliving another or others, or of living after some event has taken place.

"But as to any interesting speculation concerning its state of survivorship, 'tis plain they had none."—Warburton: Divine Legation, bk. v., § 6.

2. Law: The right of a joint tenant or other person who has a joint interest in an estate to take the whole estate upon the death of the other.

"From the same principle also arises the remaining grand incident of joint-estates; viz., the doctrine of survivorship, by which two or more persons are seized of a joint estate, of inheritance, for their own lives, or pur auter vie, or are jointly possessed of any chattel interest, the entire tenancy upon the decease of any of them remains to the survivors, and at length to the last survivor; and he shall be entitled to the whole estate, whatever it be, whether an inheritance or a common freehold only, or even a less estate."—Blackstone: Comment., bk. ii., ch. 12.

¶ Chance of survivorship: The chance that a person of one age has of surviving another of a different age. Thus, according to the Carlisle Tables of Mortality, the chances of survivorship for two persons aged twenty-five and sixty-five respectively are eighty-nine and eleven; in other words, the chances are eight to one that the younger will survive the older.

II. Technically:

1. Law:

(1) English and Roman Canon Law: A censure inflicted on a clerk or priest in orders, for remedial purposes, the effect of which is to take away from him, for a fixed time, or until he repents and makes satisfaction, the exercise of his sacred functions in his office or benefice. Suspension is of three kinds: (1) ab ordine, where a clerk cannot exercise his functions; (2) ab officio, where he is forbidden to exercise them in his charge or cure; and (3) a beneficio, where he is deprived of the revenues of his benefice, and of any control over it. Suspension is removed by absolution, revocation of the censure by the person inflicting it, expiry of time, or by dispensation.

"Suspension is the sentence which even the bishop's chancellor can pronounce upon a clerk who has misconducted himself. It is a temporary punishment of the same nature as deprivation, and subject to criticism and review by the civil courts."—Macmillan's Magazine, Nov., 1869, p. 80.

(2) English Law: The temporary stop of a man's right, as when a seignory, rent, or other profit out of land lies dormant for a time, by reason of the unity of possession of the seignory, rent, &c., and of the land out of which they issue.

2. Music: The holding or prolongation of a note in any chord into the chord which follows, thereby often producing a discord. The first appearance of the note to be suspended is called its preparation; its presence as a discord, its percussion; its removal to a note of concord or rest in key, or some legitimate sound of a sequence, its resolution. Suspensions are named after the interval of the note forming the discord. Two suspended notes form a double suspension, three a triple suspension and so on. The intervals most commonly suspended are the fourth, sixth, seventh, and ninth. The percussion of a discord of suspension is generally on the strong accent of a bar.

3. Eng. public schools: A name given at various schools to a form midway between the Lower and Upper divisions.

4. Rhet.: A keeping of the hearer in doubt and in attentive expectation of what is to follow, or what is to be the inference or conclusion from the arguments or observations.

¶ (1) Pleas in suspension:

(3) Suspension of arms: A short truce or cessation of operations agreed on by the commanders of the opposing forces, as for the burying of the dead, making proposals for surrender, peace, &c.

suspension-bridge, s. A bridge sustained by flexible supports secured at each extremity. The points of support are the tops of strong pillars or small towers, erected for the purpose at each extremity of the bridge. Over these pillars the chains pass, and are attached behind them to rocks or massive frames of iron firmly secured underground. These masses of masonry are named anchorages. The flooring is connected with the chains by means of strong, upright iron rods.

Menai Suspension-bridge.

a. One of the piers, having massive iron saddle on top, seated on rollers for free motion. b. c. Extreme stone-work and arches on the Anglesea coast. d. Backstays, which are allowed room for expansion and contraction, these movements being assisted by rollers at angles, the backstays themselves being carried through tunnels in subterranean wedged-shaped masses of masonry, and firmly bolted in the rock. e. Roadway, stiffened to prevent oscillation, of which there are two kinds in suspension-bridges—horizontal and vertical; thus a heavy load at e will cause a depression and pull down the curved chain above it, at the same time the center of the roadway will rise. f. f. Vertical rods, an inch square, supporting the sleepers in the flooring of the roadway

Metal-work: A vertical drilling-machine, used in locomotive and boiler work, &c. It has a frame which may be bolted to the ceiling.

suspension-railway, s. A railway in which the carriage is suspended from an elevated track, one carriage on each side of a single track, so as to balance, or suspended between two tracks. The illustration shows an elevated single-track railway in Algeria, where sixty miles of suspension railway are at work; employed chiefly in carrying esparto.

A scale swung by pendent rods from levers above, in contra-distinction to the usual platform-scales, whose levers are beneath.

sŭs-pĕn'-sive, a. [Eng. suspens(e); -ive.]

3. Support, maintenance.

"He assigned forth certaine rents for the sustentation of the canons."—Holinshed: Hist. Scotland; Malcolm.

sustentation-fund s.

Church Hist.: A fund raised by any religious body to assist its poorer churches; specif., a fund devised by the Rev. Dr. Thomas Chalmers (1780-1847), and constituted under his direction at the disruption of the Scotch Establishment in 1843. Religious denominations depending solely on voluntary contributions had found it comparatively easy to gather together town congregations able to support their ministers, but to do so in the rural districts was nearly or quite impracticable. Dr. Chalmers aimed at overcoming this difficulty by establishing a fund to which all congregations of the Free Church were expected to contribute according to ability. From this each minister, urban and rural, received an equal dividend. Afterward it was found necessary to modify this part of the plan slightly. While a large number of the ministers had no other professional stipend but that received from the sustentation fund, the wealthier congregations in fairly supporting the fund were permitted to supplement the means of their pastor. In various religious bodies in this country the same plan has been pursued; but the name sustentation fund has been applied specifically to that form of contribution in Presbyterian Churches.

sūs-tēn'-tīve, *sus-ten-tif, a. [Eng. sustent; -ive.] Sustaining.

sus-ter, s. [SISTER.]

sūs-tīn'-ēnt, s. [Lat. sustinens, pr. par. of sustineo=to sustain (q. v.).] Support.

"The intervals of his sutorial operations."—London Daily Telegraph.

sū-trā, s. [Sansc.=a sacred tradition; sūt=a thread.]

Hindu Literature (pl.): Certain books of aphorisms composed by the Brahmans, which are declared to be founded on the Vedas and the Brahmanas, though they did not contend that they were directly inspired. In these writings they developed the system of sacrifice, and raised to a greater height their own caste-pretensions. The Sutras taken collectively constituted the Vedangas (q. v.).

sūt-teē, sāt-ī', s. [From Sansc. sati=a virtuous wife; sāt=pure.]

Anthropology:

1. A form of widow-sacrifice (itself a form of funeral-sacrifice), formerly common in Brahmanic India, in which the widow was burnt with her dead husband on the funeral pyre. Many went willingly and gayly to their doom, but others were driven by fear of disgrace, by family influence, by priestly threats, and, in not a few cases, by sheer violence. Sutte was abolished by law in British India, Dec. 4, 1829, but scarcely a year passes by free from its being carried out in some of the native principalities, and between 1813 and 1828, in Calcutta, the suttees ranged from 390 to 600 yearly. When the question of prohibiting suttee was under discussion, the Brahmans quoted the Rig-Veda in favor of the practice; but it was shown by Professor Wilson that the text had been falsified. (M. Müller: Chips from a German Workshop, ii. 34-37.) But though suttee was expressly prohibited by the ancient Brahmanic funeral rites (M. Müller, in Zeits. d. deutsch. morgenl. Geschichte, ix.), and the widow, after ascending the funeral pile, was to be led down by a brother-in-law, this symbolic form points to an earlier period when the sacrifice was really carried out. [WIDOW-SACRIFICE.] The revival must have taken place at a remote date; for Propertius (EL, III. xiii. 15-20) graphically describes it, and vividly contrasts the behavior of Indian with that of Roman wives.

2. A widow burnt on the funeral pile of her dead husband. [1.]

"In Brahmanic India the widow of a Hindu of the Brahman or the Kshatriya caste was burnt on the funeral pile with her husband, as a sati or 'good woman,' which word has passed into English, as suttee."—Tylor: Prim. Cult. (ed. 1873), i. 465.

Anthrop.: Sutteeism (q. v.).

"While admitting, with Prof. Müller, that the more modern ordinance of suttee-burning is a corrupt departure from the early Brahmanic ritual, we may nevertheless find some reason to consider the practice as not a new invention by the later Hindu priesthood, but as the revival, under congenial influence, of an ancient Aryan rite, belonging originally to a period even earlier than the Veda."—Tylor: Prim. Cult. (ed. 1873), i. 466.

sūt-teē'-īsm, s. [Eng. suttee; -ism.]

Anthrop.: The rite or practice of suttee (q. v.).

"The chief characteristic of sutteeism is its expiatory quality; for by this act of faith, the sati not only makes atonement for the sins of her husband, and secures the remission of her own, but has the joyful assurance of reunion to the object whose beatitude she secures."—Bal-four: Cyclop. India (ed. 3d), iii. 782.

sūt-tle, v. i. [SUTLER.] To follow the occupation of a sutler.

sūt-tle, s. [Etym. doubtful.]

Comm.: A term applied to weight, when the tare has been deducted and the tret has yet to be allowed.

sū-tūr'-al, a. [Eng. suture(e), -al.]

1. Ord. Lang.: Pertaining or relating to a suture or seam.
2. Bot.: Of, belonging to, situated at, or taking place at a suture.

sutural-dehiscence, s.

Bot.: Dehiscence along one or more sutures. If the dehiscence is along the ventral suture the fruit is a follicle, if along the dorsal and ventral sutures it is a legume. There are no dissepiments, the fruit being composed of only one carpel.

Bot.: The ventral suture. [SUTURE.]

sū-tūr'-al-lŷ, adv. [Eng. sutural; -ly.] In a sutural manner; by means of a suture.

bōl, bōy; pōut, jōwl; cat, cell, chorus, chin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, as; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f. -cian, -tian = shan. -tion, -sion = shūn; tion, -sion = zhūn. -tious, -cious, -sious = shūs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bel, del

sū-tū-rāte*, v. t. [Eng. sutur(e); -ate.] To join or unite by a suture; to sew or knit together.

"These are by oculists called 'orbitæ,' and are each of them compounded of six several bones, which, being most conveniently sutured among themselves, do make up those curious arched chambers in which these lookers or beholders dwell; in which, and from which, they may be aptly said to perform their offices."—Smith: On Old Age, p. 93.

sū-ture, s. [Fr., from Lat. sutura, from sutus, pa. par. of suo=to sew.]

I. Ord. Lang.: The act of sewing; the line along which two things are joined, united, or sewed together, so as to form a seam, or something resembling a seam.

II. Technically:

1. Anat.: The immovable junction of two parts by their margins; as, the sutures of the skull, i. e., the lines of junction of the bones of which the skull is composed. Various types of suture exist, as the Serrated or Dentated Suture, the Squamous or Scaly Suture, and the Harmonic Suture or Harmonia. Arranged according to their situation, there are coronal, frontal, fronto-parietal, occipito-parietal, and many other sutures.

2. Bot.: The line formed by the cohesion of two parts. If the suture formed by the carpellary leaves in a pistil face the center of a flower, it is called the ventral suture; if it face the perianth, the dorsal suture. The former corresponds to the margin, and the latter to the midrib of the carpellary leaf.

3. Entom.: The line formed by the meeting of the elytra of a beetle when they are confluent.

4. Surg.: The uniting of the lips or edges of a wound by stitching.

5. Zoöl.: The outlines of the septa in the Tetra-branchiata, from their resemblance to the sutures of the skull. When these outlines are folded, the elevations are called saddles, and the intervening depressions lobes. (Woodward.)

sū-tured, adj. [Eng. sutur(e); -ed.] Having a suture or sutures; united.

sū-versed, subst. [Pref. sub-, and Eng. versed (q. v.).]

A. As subst.: A feudallord; a lord paramount.

"The Sultan should remain Sovereign in Eastern Roumelia and suzerain in Bulgaria."—London Standard.

B. As adj.: Sovereign, paramount.

"The violation of the self-rule granted to the province came, not from the suzerain Sultan."—London Daily Telegraph.

sū-zēr-āin-tŷ, s. [Fr. suzeraineté.] The office, dignity, or position of a suzerain; paramount power or authority.

"He recognizes the suzerainty of the Sultan, and holds himself responsible for the public security."—London Daily Telegraph.

svān-bērg-īte, subst. [After Svanberg; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A rare mineral occurring only in crystals and crystal-grains. Crystallization, rhombohedral. Hardness, 5.0; specific gravity, 3.30; color, honey-yellow, shades of brown, rose-red; luster, vitreous. Composition: Uncertain; apparently essentially a combination of a phosphate and a sulphate of alumina, lime, and soda, with some water. Found at Horrsjöberg, Wermland, Sweden.

swāb, s. [Formed from swabber (q. v.); cf. Sw. svab=a fire-brush; svabla=to swab; Dan. svabre=to swab; Norw. svabba=to splash about.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. A mop for cleaning floors, ships' decks, or the like.

"One of the fore-castle men took a swab and swabbed up the blood."—Hannay: Singleton Fontenoy.

swād-dle-bānd*, sweth-el-band*, s. [English swaddle, and band.] The same as SWADDLING-BAND (q. v.).

swād-dlēr, s. [See def.] A term of contempt applied by Roman Catholics in Ireland to Protestants, especially to the more evangelical and active sects. The following extract and note from The Life of the Rev. John Wesley, by Dr. Coke and Mr. Moore (Derby; Richardson & Son, 1845), confirms Southey's statement in Life of Wesley, ii. 153, that the name was first given in derision to a preacher who took for his text Luke ii. 12.

"Butler and his mob were now in higher spirits than ever; they scoured the streets day and night, frequently hallooing as they went along, 'Five pounds for a swaddler's head!'"

To this a note is added (p. 238):

"A name first given to Mr. Cennick, from his preaching on those words, 'Ye shall find the babe wrapped in swaddling clothes, lying in a manger.'"—Notes and Queries, Feb. 19, 1870, p. 211.

swād-dlīng, swād-līng*, pr. par., a. & subst. [SWADDLE, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As subst. (pl.): Swaddling-clothes.

1. Ord. Lang.: In the same sense as II. 2.

II. Technically:

1. Naut.: The groove around a tackle-block for the strap. Also called the Score.

2. Ornith.: Any one of the numerous passerine birds of the family Hirundinidae. In this country the best-known species are the barn swallow; the cliff, eaves, or chimney swallow; the white-bellied or tree swallow, and the bank swallow. The species usually described by naturalists as the type of the family is Hirundo rustica, a well-known European visitor, whose arrival from Africa (usually about the middle of April) is eagerly looked for as a sign of approaching summer. Swallows usually arrive in pairs—a male and a female—though several pairs often form a small flight; but if a single bird is seen to arrive, there is a strong presumption that it has lost its mate. They return with unfailing regularity to their old haunts, and in May commence building their nests, which are in shape somewhat like a flattened cup, divided perpendicularly; they are made of clay, mud, and straw, lined with horse-hair or feathers, and the eggs, which are from four to six in number, are white, spotted with a purplish-red. The food of the swallow consists entirely of winged insects; on their arrival, these birds feed exclusively on gnats and flies, in summer small beetles are very largely taken. These are captured as the birds fly with open mouth, the bristles with which the gape is supplied and the viscid saliva assisting to retain the prey. Like owls, Swallows reject the undigested portions of their food in small pellets or castings. It was formerly believed that Swallows hibernated in temperate climates, but the fact of their migration is proved beyond a doubt, and the old belief has almost, if not entirely, died out. The male is about eight inches long; beak black, forehead, chin, and throat, chestnut; head, neck, back, rump, and upper tail-coverts steel-blue; tail very much forked; under surface buffy-white, legs and toes slender and black, claws black and sharp. In the female the tail-feathers are not so long, nor are they developed in the young birds till they have left Europe for the south. The note of the Swallow is a low musical twitter.

swān, s. [A. S. swan; cogn. with Dut. zwaan; Icel. svanr; Dan. svane; Sw. svan; Ger. schwan; O. H. Ger. swan, swana.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Lit.: In the same sense as II. 2.

2. Fig.: Applied to a famous poet; thus, Shakespeare is called the Swan of Avon, Virgil the Swan of Mantua.

II. Technically:

1. Astron.: The constellation Cygnus.

2. Ornith.: Any individual of the genus Cygnus (q. v.). The Swans form a sharply-defined group; the body is elongated, the neck very long, head moderate; beak about as long as head; legs short, and placed far back. On the under-surface the plumage is thick and fur-like; on the upper side the feathers are broad, but both above and below the body is thickly covered with down. Their short legs render their movements on land awkward and ungainly, but in the water these birds are graceful to a proverb. Their food consists of vegetable substances and weeds, their long necks enabling them to dip below the surface and to reach their food at considerable depths. Swans breed in high latitudes, but the domesticated species, Cygnus olor, the Mute Swan, breeds on eyots and the shores of lakes, making a very large nest on land, in which five or six greenish eggs are deposited. The young generally are covered with a gray down till the age of two years, when they assume the characteristic white plumage of the older birds. Three other species visit temperate Europe: the Elk, Hooper, Whooper, or Whistling Swan (C. musicus); Bewick's Swan (C. bewicki), and the Polish Swan (C. immutabilis), which owes its specific name to the fact that the cygnets are pure white like the parent birds. The Mute Swan is the largest and most majestic of the four, and is easily recognized by the black knob at the base of the bill. There are some other species, chiefly from North America, but the most beautiful of the whole genus is the Black-necked Swan (C. nigricollis), from South America; while the most remarkable is the Black Swan (C. atratus), from Australia, first taken to other countries early in the seventeenth century. So convinced were the ancients that white plumage was of the essence of a swan, that a "black swan" was a proverbial expression for something extremely rare—if not for the non-existent—from the days of Juvenal (vi. 161-4) to those of Sir Thomas Browne (Vulg. Err., bk. v., ch. xix.). The stories about the musical voice of the Swan, though greatly embellished by early writers, appear to have some foundation in fact so far as regards the Whooper (C. musicus). T. Rymer Jones says, "The dying Swan, we find, has nothing peculiar in its notes, but its last cries may be as loud and musical as any others to which it has given utterance" (Cassell's Book of Birds, iv. 125).

Anthrop.: The outward form or vesture of a swan-maiden (q. v.).

Fading in music."

Shakesp.: Merchant of Venice, iii. 2.

swan-maiden, s.

Anthrop.: A supernatural being in the shape of a swan, fabled to have the power of assuming the figure of a beautiful young woman, by taking off the swan-coat or swan-shift. Many of these swan-maidens are said to have contracted marriage with men who had obtained power over them by getting possession of the swan-coat or swan-shift, but if the swan-maiden recovers this from her husband, even though she may have borne him children, she assumes her former shape and flies away from him forever. [VALKYR, WISH-CHILDREN.]

"These lovely swan-maidens must have been long known to German tradition. When they bathe in the cooling flood, they lay down on the bank the swan-ring, the swan-shift, who takes it from them has them in his power."—Grimm: Deut. Mythol. (ed. Stallybrass), i. 428.

swan-mark, s. A mark indicating the ownership of a swan.

Pathol.: A pestilence, called sudor anglicus (the English sweat), as it only affected Englishmen. Caius, who first described it in 1552, called it Ephemerica pestilens, or One-day pestilence. It was introduced into England by the irregular troops of the Earl of Richmond in 1485, when he came over to assert his claim to the throne against Richard III. The battle of Bosworth was fought on Aug. 22, 1485, and immediately after the disease appeared in the army, and in London on the arrival of the victors four days later. It was a violent special type of miasmatic fever. It lasted five weeks and passed away as suddenly as it came. Later epidemics of the same disease occurred in 1506, 1517, 1528, and 1550, after which it never appeared again. On the last occasion it originated in the army of Edward VI., in France, and was brought by the affected soldiers to England; two sons of Charles Brandon, both Dukes of Suffolk and nephews of Henry VIII., died of it, and a vast number of men of inferior rank.

Swē-den-bor'-gī-an, a. & s. [See def.]

A. As adj.: Of or belonging to Swedenborg. [B.]

B. As subst.: A follower of Emanuel Swedenborg, son of Jesper Swedenborg, bishop of Skara, in West Gothland. The son was born at Stockholm on Jan. 29, 1688. He thought much of religion in very early life, and diligently studied physics, mathematics, and classics at the University of Upsal, afterward visiting Oxford, Paris, &c. Before leaving the University, he had been appointed by Charles XII. assessor in the Royal Metallic College of Sweden, and, in 1719, was ennobled by Charles' successor, Queen Ulrica Eleonora, under the name of Swedenborg, by which he is generally known. Between early manhood and his fifty-eighth year, he actively prosecuted his studies in mathematics, physics, &c., publishing various works, as the Opera Philosophica et Mineralia (in 1733), in three volumes, and the Philosophy of the Infinite (in 1734). In April, 1743, being at an inn in London, Swedenborg considered that he had a vision of the Lord, who called him to a holy office, opened his sight to the spiritual world, and endowed him with the gift of conversing with spirits and angels. In August he returned to Stockholm, commenced the study of the Hebrew scriptures, resigned his assessorship in 1747, and spent the remainder of his life in forming and propagating his theological views. He died in London in his eighty-fifth year, March 29, 1772, in Great Bath Street, Coldbath Fields, and was buried in the Swedish Church in Ratcliff Highway. His system is presented at length in his various works, especially his Arcana Cœlestia (8 vols., London, 1749-1756). He believed that he was several times allowed to enter heaven, "which was arranged in streets and squares like earthly cities, but with fields and gardens interposed." There was a magnificent palace with a temple in the midst, with a table in it, and on the table the Word of God, with two angels by its side. The form of angels was altogether like that of men. Matter and spirit are connected by an eternal law. He accepted only twenty-nine of the Old Testament Books, rejecting Ruth, 1 and 2 Chronicles, Ezra, Nehemiah, Esther, Job, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and the Song of Solomon. Of the New Testament he accepted only the Gospels and the Apocalypse. He held that there is a double sponse in scripture, the most important being the spiritual. He believed in one God and in the Trinity, and that tho Lord and Savior Jesus Christ was that God; that Jehovah himself became incarnate as the Word. Heaven and hell are not places, but states, and the Devil is not a person, but a name of hell. The judgment on the first Christian church took effect in 1757, and was seen by Swedenborg in the spiritual world, after which, and in lieu of it, the New Church, called in Revelation (xxi., xxii.) New Jerusalem, descended from heaven. Swedenborg himself founded no church. His followers publicly associated themselves as a congregation in Eastcheap in 1788. In 1810 a Swedenborgian Society was established, and a Missionary and Tract Society in 1821. Congregations exist in the United States, England, on the continent of Europe, &c.

Botany: Castanea vesca or vulgaris, a tree with oblong, lanceolate, acuminate, mucrono-serrate, glabrous leaves, and clusters of minute, pale greenish-yellow, unisexual, apetalous flowers in spikes. The fruit is a prickly cupule, husk, or involucre, with one or more nuts, each with one large seed. It grows wild in America and in the south of Europe. On the slopes of Etna, where there are forests of it, there grow some old trees with trunks of enormous girth. The chestnuts of commerce are derived chiefly from the cultivated varieties of the tree, and are larger and sweeter than the wild fruit. The nuts are consumed as an article of daily food in the south of Europe, and in parts of France are served up for breakfast, boiled in milk. Many houses in the older parts of London are said by Evelyn to have been built of its timber, which has the character of keeping off insects, spiders, &c. It is good for mill and water works, besides affording excellent stakes for palisades, and props for vines and hops. The timber is extensively used in America, especially for the inside finishing of houses, furniture, &c. Called also the Spanish Chestnut.

3. A piece of water which is especially frequented by fish. [†.]

*3. A smooth gliding motion.

"Both the swim and the trip are properly mine."—Ben Jonson: Cynthia's Revels, ii. 1.

4. The swimming-bladder of fishes.

"The braces have the nature and use of tendons, in contracting the swim."—Grew.

¶ In the swim: In the secret; knowing all the circumstances of an enterprise, &c. (Slang.)

"A man is said to be in the swim when any piece of good fortune has happened, or seems likely to happen, to him. To have rowed one's college-boat to the head of the river, to have received a legacy, to have made a good book on the Derby, are any of them sufficient to have put one in the swim. The metaphor is piscatorial, 'swim' being the term applied by Thames fishermen to those sections of the river which are especially frequented by fish. The angler who casts his bait into these may depend upon sport, whereas his neighbor at a little distance may not have a nibble, being out of the swim."—Macmillan's Magazine, Nov., 1869, pp. 71, 72.

Compar. Anat.: The same as SWIMMING-BLADDER (q. v.).

swim'-mēr-ēt', subst. [English swimmer; dimin. suff. -et.]

Comp. Anat. (pl.): The limbs on the abdominal segments of the Crustacea, so modified as to serve for swimming organs. In the Lobster, in which they may be seen to advantage, there are five pairs, the last pair being greatly expanded, and forming, with the telson, a powerful caudal fin. Each swimmeret consists of a basal joint, to which are attached two diverging joints, the inner of which is called the endopodite and the outer the exopodite. In the female, the fine hairs fringing the swimmerets serve as supports for the eggs or "berries" during the spawning season.

swim'-mīng (1), pr. par., a. & s. [SWIM (1), v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.:

1. Ord. Lang.: (See the verb.)

2. Bot.: Floating under water, as Confervæ.

C. As subst.: The act or art of sustaining and propelling the body in water.

¶ The human body, when the lungs are inflated, is slightly lighter than an equal volume of fresh water, and consequently floats on the surface. It does so yet more easily on salt water, which is heavier than fresh. But, in floating, the head tends to sink. The art of swimming in mau is the art of keeping the head above water and the lungs as much as possible inflated. To raise the head above water, the rest of the body must as much as possible be kept below it; and when a person unable to swim, falling into deep water, instinctively raises his arm above the surface, his head simultaneously sinks. Movement forward in swimming is produced by the flexion and abduction of the arms and by the extension and adduction of the legs. Quadrupeds swim easily, their head being so placed as to remain naturally above water.

Zoöl.: The same as NECTOCALYX (q. v.).

swimming-bladder, s.

Comp. Anat.: The swim-bladder or air-bladder of Fishes; a hollow sac, formed of several tunics, containing gas, situated in the abdominal cavity, but outside the peritoneal sac, entirely closed or communicating by a duct with the intestinal tract. The special function of the swimming-bladder is to alter the specific gravity of the fish, or to change the center of gravity. It is absent in the Leptocardi, Cyclostomata, Chondropterygii, and Holocephala, but occurs in all the Ganoidei, in one sub-order of which (Dipnoi) it possesses anatomical characters, and assumes, to some extent, the functions of a lung; in the genus Ceratodus, the swimming-bladder, though a single cavity, has symmetrically arranged internal pouches, while in the other genera of the sub-order (Lepidosiren and Protopterus) it is laterally halved, is supplied with venous blood by a true pulmonary artery, and by its cellular structure closely approaches the lungs of a reptile.

Zoöl. (pl.): Crabs having their hind pair of feet especially modified for swimming, spec. the genus Portunus (q. v.).

swimming-herb, s.

Bot.: Lemna minor. (Britten & Holland.)

2. The language spoken by the Swiss.

Swiss-muslin, s.

Fabric: A fine, open, transparent muslin.

switch, *swiçh, s. [O. Dut. swick; Norw. svige, svæg; Icel. sveigr, svigi.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. A small flexible twig or rod.

"With two spurs or one, and no great matter which, Boots bought, or boots borrow'd, a whip or a switch."

Cowper: The Cantab. (Trans.)

2. A queue of false hair, or of some substance made to resemble hair, fastened together at one end, and worn by ladies.

3. A key on a gas-burner to regulate the amount of gas passing, and, consequently, the light.

II. Technically:

1. Rail.: The movable rails which connect one line of track with another. Switches are known as stub-switches and split-switches. In the stub-switch the switch-rail has square butted ends. In the split-switch the switch-rail is pointed, and somewhat automatic. Switches and signals are said to be connected when they are simply coupled together and have a pari passu motion; they are said to be interlocked when the movement of a signal to safety cannot be commenced until after the necessary movement of the switches has been completed, and also the movement of the switches cannot be commenced until after all the signals concerned by them have been set to danger. (Rapier: Railway Signals, p. 23.)

2. Teleg.: A device for connecting one circuit with another, or for dividing a circuit into two parts, or, in short, for altering any of the connections of a line or circuit. The ordinary ground or lever switch is a small metallic strip pivoted at one end, the pivot being connected by a wire to one portion of an electrical circuit. The other end of the strap can be turned to rest on an anvil or bed connected with the line desired to be brought into circuit.

switch-back, adj. A term applied to a form of railway, consisting of alternate descending and ascending inclines. The momentum acquired in the descent takes the carriages up the opposite incline, over the summit to the next downward slope, and so on.

switch-board, s.

Teleg.: An aggregation of switches upon one base, so that any instrument in an office may be connected with any wire or any battery, or cut out altogether.

2. Elect.: A board provided with a switch or switches for opening, closing, or interchanging electric currents connected therewith.

switch-lantern, s. A lantern on the lever of a railway-switch, to indicate the condition of the switch either by its position or by the display of a colored light.

switch, v. t. & i. [SWITCH, s.]

1. Ord. Lang.: A twisting link in a chain, consisting of a ring or hook ending in a headed pin which turns in a link of the chain; the object is to avoid kinking; a fastening so contrived as to allow the thing fastened to revolve freely on its axis.

"The gun is placed on the top, where there is an iron socket for the gun to rest in, and a swivel to turn the muzzle any way."—Dampier: Voyages (an. 1688).

II. Technically:

1. Naut.: A rest, having adjustment in azimuth, for supporting a small piece of ordnance on the gunwale of a boat or vessel.

2. Ord.: A small cannon, whose trunnions are placed in a carrier, which is pivoted in a socket, so that by the two adjustments the gun may be pointed in any direction; a pivot-gun.

3. Saddlery: A loop or runner through which the check-rein passes.

swivel-bridge, s. A bridge which rotates on an axis, moving in a horizontal plane.

swivel-eye, s. A squint-eye.

swivel-eyed, a. Squint-eyed. (Slang.) swivel-gun, s.

Ord.: A gun mounted on a pivot to traverse horizontally in a circle.

swivel-hanger, s.

Mach.: A form of shaft-hanger, invented by Edward Bancroft, in which, to insure the weight of the shaft being received over the entire length of the box, he hung the box on a universal joint, and made its axis of vibration coincide with the center of the box. This permitted the use of longer boxes than were before practicable, and the pressure per square inch on the surface was lessened.

Naut.: A turning hook strapped to a tackle-block.

Swivel-hook block: A pulley block in which the suspending hook is swiveled to the block, so that the latter may turn to present the sheave in any direction.

swivel-joint, s. A section in a chain, or a joint on a rod, which allows the parts to twist without kinking or distortion.

swivel-loom, s. A kind of loom formerly used for the weaving of tapes and narrow goods.

swivel-plow, s. A plow having its land-side, sole, and mold-board on an axis, so that the combined portions may be turned over to throw the furrow to the right or to the left.

three branches, and usually provided with a broad plate of metal, the guard-plate, at the point where it is attached to the blade. The blade of a sword consists of the tang, which enters the hilt; the shoulder, which abuts against the end of the hilt; the forte, the half of the blade nearest the hilt; the faible, or foible, the half nearest the point; the point, the back, the flat, the edge. The parts of the hilt vary in different kinds of swords; the principal are the pommel, or back piece; the gripe; the bars of the basket, in sabers; the stool or guard-plate; the bow, in sergeants' swords and horse-artillery sabers; the cross, as in the old Highland claymore; the linguets, in foils and rapiers. The blade, usually of polished steel, may be straight and pointed for thrusting, as in the rapier; with a sharp point and one or two cutting edges, for thrusting and striking, as in the broadsword; or curved and with a sharp convex edge for striking, as in the Eastern scimitar. Swords are worn suspended from the waist by a sword-belt, and inclosed in a sheath called a scabbard. The sword of modern days has been developed by successive improvements from the rude cutting weapons of the men of the Stone Age, as shown in the illustration.

Bot.: The genus Xiphopteris. Xiphopteris serrulata, from the West Indies, is sometimes cultivated in greenhouses.

sword-fight, s. A combat with swords; fencing.

1. Astron.: Dorado (q. v.).

2. Ichthy.: A popular name for any individual of the Xiphiidæ (q. v.). They are pelagic fishes, widely distributed in tropical and sub-tropical seas, extremely strong and swift, so that the larger species are rarely captured, and more rarely preserved for examination and study. Their popular name is derived from their formidable sword-like weapon, formed by the coalescence and prolongation of the maxillary and intermaxillary bones beyond the lower jaw; it is very hard and strong, and capable of inflicting terrible wounds. All the species undergo considerable change; young specimens differing widely from the adult in the general shape of the body, and in the production of the lower as well as of the upper jaw. Sword-fishes seem to have a mortal antipathy to whales and other large Cetacea, attacking them whenever occasion offers, and, so far as is known, always coming off victorious. In their fury Sword-fishes often attack boats and vessels, evidently mistaking them for Cetaceans; and sometimes the sword has been driven through the bottom of a ship, and broken off by the fish in vain struggles to withdraw it. Sword-fishes are the largest of the Acanthopterygii; specimens of the genus Histiophorus [SAILOR-FISH, XIPHIIDÆ], from the Indian and Pacific Oceans, reaching a length of from twelve to fifteen feet, of which the sword occupies rather more than three. The Common or Mediterranean Sword-fish sometimes reaches a length of ten feet, with a proportionately shorter sword; it is bluish-black above, merging into silver below. The tunny-fishers often take these fish in their nets, and their flesh, especially when young, is said to be equal in flavor to that of the tunny (q. v.).

Bot.: (1) Alsine segetalis; (2) Melilotus segetalis. (Paxton.)

"Clement lai in swoghe."—Octavian, 900.

swound, v. & s. [SWOON, v. & s.]

swóuns, interj. [See def.] A corruption or contraction of God's wounds, used as an oath. [ZOUNDS, ZOONS.]

S-wrench, s. [See def.] A spanner or wrench of an S-shape, to enable it to reach parts not so readily approached by the ordinary monkey-wrench. It has two jaws of different angles, and an adjusting-screw in the stock.

swüm, pret. & pa. par. of v. [SWIM, v.]

swúng, pret. & pa. par. of v. [SWING, v.]

tswý, s. [Etym. doubtful.]

Bot.: Salicornia herbacea.

sý'-a-grüs, s. [Named from Syagrus, who first wrote the history of the Trojan War in verse.]

Bot.: A genus of unarmed Coccoæ, closely akin to Cocos itself. Flower spike enveloped in a double spathe; fruit like that of the cocoanut, but with a channel running from each of the three pores to the apex of the fruit. Known species five or six, chiefly from Brazil.

Bot.: Dillenia indica.

Sýb'-ar-ite, subst. [Latin Sybarites, from Greek Sybaritēs=a Sybarite, an inhabitant of Sybaris.] Originally an inhabitant of Sybaris, an ancient Greek town in southern Italy, noted for the effeminacy and voluptuousness of its inhabitants; hence an effeminate person; a person devoted to luxury and pleasure.

Sýb'-ar-ít-ic, Sýb'-ar-ít-ic-al, a. [SYBARITE.] Effeminate, luxurious, wanton.

"Like most Trent fishermen, evidently had a supreme contempt for the Sybaritic vehicle of the Thames angler."—Field, Dec. 26, 1886.

Sýb'-ar-ít-ism, subst. [Eng. Sybarit(e); -ism.] Effeminacy, wantonness, voluptuousness.

"Sufficient to elevate to the seventh heaven of Sybaritism an amateur of oysters."—London Daily Telegraph.

sý'-bōt'-ic, a. [Gr. sybōtikos=of or belonging to a swineherd; sybōtēs=a swineherd; sys=a swine, and boskō=to feed, to tend.] Pertaining to a swineherd.

"Returning one day in a temporary fit of nostalgia to his old University, he was twitted with his sybotic tendencies, was advised to edit Theocritus, and was asked what a scholar and a gentleman could possibly see in a fat hog."—London Daily Telegraph.

sý'-bōt'-ism, subst. [Eng. sybot(ic); -ism.] The tending of swine. (London Daily Telegraph.)

sýc'-a-mīne, s. [Gr. sykaminos.]

1. Ord. Lang.: The mulberry.

"If ye had faith as a grain of mustard-seed, ye might say unto this sycamine tree, Be thou plucked up by the root, and be thou planted in the sea."—Luke xvii. 6.

*2. Botany: Lonicera periclymenum. (Prior.) [WOODBINE.]

sýc'-a-mōre, sýc'-ō-mōre, sic-a-mour, subst. [SYCOMORE.]

1. Ordinary Language and Botany:

(1) The woodbine (?).

"The hege also, that yede in compas
And closed in all the green herbere,
With sycamour was set, and eglatere."

Chaucer: Flower and Leaf, 54.

(2) Acer pseudo-platanus, an umbrageous tree, forty to sixty feet high; with spreading branches; large, five-lobed, coarsely and unequally serrate leaves, glaucous and downy on the veins beneath; pendulous racemes of greenish flowers, and glabrous fruit furnished with two long, membranous wings. It flowers in May and June. The wood is used for bowls, trenchers, and other turnery. The sap is sacchariferous. It grows wild in Switzerland, Germany, Austria, Italy, and western Asia. It is a hardy tree, flourishing in spite of high winds or sea spray. When the leaves first appear (in April) they are covered with a clammy juice containing about one part in eleven of sugar, attractive to insects, by which they are perforated and disfigured. The name is also applied to the plane tree or buttonwood of America, and the fig mulberry of Egypt and Syria. [SYCOMORE.]

2. Entom.: A European night-moth, Acronycta aceris, so called because the caterpillar—which, when alarmed, rolls itself up like a millepede—feeds chiefly on the sycamore, though also on the horse-chestnut and the oak.

Bot.: Ficus sycomorus.

sycamore-moth, s. [SYCOMORE, 2.]

sycamore-tree, s. The sycamore.

"The sycamore-tree by the window."

Longfellow: Evangeline, i. 4.

sýçe, s. [East Indian.] A native groom.

sý-cheē, s. [Chin.] The fine silver of China cast into ingots, in shape resembling a native shoe, and weighing commonly more than a pound troy. These ingots are marked with the seal of the banker or assayer as a guarantee of their purity.

sycee-silver, s. The same as SYCEE (q. v.).

sý-cheē, s. [Chinese.] The Chinese name for black tea.

sých-nō-car'-poüs, a [Gr. synchos=frequent, and karpos=fruit.]

Bot.: Polycarpous (q. v.).

sý'-çite, s. [Gr. sykites=fig-like; sykon=a fig.] A nodule or pebble resembling a fig.

sýc'-ō-çer'-ic, adjective. [Eng. sycocer(yl); -ic.] Derived from or contained in sycoceryl alcohol.

Chemistry: $C_{18}H_{28}O_2$. A crystalline substance, obtained by treating sycoceryl alcohol with dilute nitric acid.

sý-cōç-ēr-ýl, s. [Greek sykon=fig; kēros=wax, and suff. -yl.]

Chem.: The hypothetical radical of sycoceryl alcohol.

Chem.: $C_{20}H_{32}O_2 = C_{18}H_{28}O \cdot C_2H_3O$. Extracted from the resin of Ficus rubiginosa by treatment with boiling alcohol, or produced by heating sycoceryl alcohol with acetyl chloride. It crystallizes in thin prisms, insoluble in water, but soluble in chloroform and benzene.

Chem.: $C_{18}H_{30}O = C_{17}H_{27}CH_2OH$. Sycocerylic alcohol. Produced by the action of an alcoholic solution of soda on sycoceryl acetate. It forms needle-shaped crystals, insoluble in water, soluble in alcohol, and melts at 90° to a liquid heavier than water.

sý-cōç-ēr-ýl'-ic, a. [Eng. sycoceryl; -ic.] Of or belonging to sycoceryl (q. v.).

sycocerylic-alcohol, s. [SYCOCERYL-ALCOHOL.]

sý-cō'-ma, s. [Gr. sykōma, from sykon=a fig.]

Med.: A wart or excrescence resembling a fig on the eyelid, the anus, or any other part.

sýc'-ō-mōre, s. [Fr. sycomore; Lat. sycomorus; Gr. sykomoros: sykon=a fig, and moron=black mulberry, so named because the fruit is a fig, and the leaves resemble those of the mulberry.]

Bot.: Ficus sycomorus, a fig-tree, with somewhat smooth, broadly-ovate, repand, or somewhat regular leaves, cordate at the base, and fruit on the trunk and older branches. It is found in Egypt and the adjacent countries, and is planted for shade near villages, roadsides, and on sea-coasts. The wood is of little value, but the fruit is sweet and edible. It is the sycamore (1 Kings x. 27; 2 Chron. i. 15; ix. 27) and sycamore (Isa. ix. 10; Luke xix. 4) of Scripture. In the last two passages the R. V. properly substitutes sycomore for sycamore. [SYCAMORE.]

sycomore-fig, s. [SYCOMORE.]

sýc'-ōn, s. [Gr. sykon=a fig.]

Zoöl.: The type genus of Syconidæ (q. v.).

sýc'-ōn-id, s. [SYCONIDÆ.] Any individual of the family Syconidæ (q. v.).

"A Syconid from the Jurassic."—Encyc. Brit. (ed. 9th), xlii. 427.

sý-cōn'-i-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. sycon; Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Zoöl. & Palæont.: A family of Calcareous Sponges, widely distributed, with three sub-families. They have regular, radially-disposed, cylindrical, ciliated chambers, opening direct into the sac-shaped gastric cavity. Sparsely represented in the Jurassic.

sýc'-ō-nī'-næ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. sycon; Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -inæ.]

Zoöl.: A sub-family of Syconidæ (q. v.), with seven genera. Radial tubes free for their whole length, or at least distally.

sý-cō'-nūs (pl. sý-cō'-nī), sý-cō'-nī-üm (pl. sý-cō'-nī-ä), s. [Gr. sykon=a fig.]

Bot.: A collective fruit having a fleshy rachis, formed like a flattened disc or a hollow receptacle, with distinct flowers and dry pericarps. Examples: Ficus, Dorstenia, Ambora.

sý-cōph'-a-ga, s. [Gr. sykon=a fig, and phagein=to eat.]

Entom.: A genus of Chalcididæ. The species are common in the south of Europe, where they aid in impregnating the female flowers of the fig-tree.

sýc'-ō-phān-çý, s. [English sycophan(t); -cy.] The character, manners, or characteristics of a sycophant; mean tale-bearing; obsequious flattery; servility.

"Sycophancy could only cringe and fawn upon the victor of Bosworth Field."—London Daily Telegraph.

sýc'-ō-phānt, síc'-ō-phānt, subst. [Lat. sycophanta=an informer, a tale-bearer, a sycophant, from Gr. sykophantēs=a fig-shower, or an informer about figs, hence a common informer, a slanderer, a false adviser. The history of the word is lost, but the etym. seems evident: Greek sykon=a fig, and phainō=to show.]

*1. An informer.

"The poor man that hath nought to lose is not afraid of the sycophant or promoter."—P. Holland: Plutarch's Morals, 205.

2. A parasite; a servile flatterer, especially of princes or great men; hence, a deceiver, an impostor.

"All the envoys who had been sent from Whitehall to Versailles had been mere sycophants of the great king."—Macaulay. Hist. Eng., ch. xxiii.

sýc'-ō-phānt, v. i. & t. [SYCOPHANT, s.]

A. Intrans.: To play the sycophant.

"His sycophanting arts being detected, that game is not to be played a second time; whereas a man of clear reputation, though his barque be split, has something left toward setting up again."—Government of the Tongue.

B. Transitive:

1. To play the sycophant toward; to flatter meanly or servilely.

2. To inform on or tell tales of to gain favor; to calumniate.

"He makes it his first business to tamper with his reader by sycophanting and misnaming the work of his adversary."—Milton: Apology for Smectymnuus.

fâte, fât, färe, amidst, whât, fâll, father; wê, wêt, hère, camel, hër, thère; pine, pít, síre, sír, marine; gô, pôť, or, wôre wôlf, wôrċ. whô, sôn; mûte cûb. cûre, unite, cûr, râle, fûll; trý, Sýrian. æ. œ = ē; ey = â. qu = k sýc-ô-phăn'-tíc, a. [Gr. sykophantikos.] Pertaining to or characteristic of a sycophant; servilely flattering or fawning; parasitic.

"They made themselves sycophantic servants to the King of Spain."—De Quincey: Spanish Nun, § 16.

Bot.: Parasitic plants.

sýc-ô-phăn'-tíc-ál, a. [Eng. sycophantic; -al.] Sycophantic.

sýc-ô-phăn'-ish, a. [Eng. sycophant, s.; -ish.] Like a sycophant; sycophantic, parasitic.

sýc-ô-phăn'-ish-lý, adv. [Eng. sycophantish; -ly.] Like a sycophant.

"Neither proud, nor sycophantishly and falsely humble."—De Quincey: Spanish Nun, § 25.

sýc-ô-phăn'-ism, s. [Eng. sycophant, s.; -ism.] The practices or manners of a sycophant; sycophancy.

"Servile sycophantism and artful bigotry."—Knox: Spirit of Despotism, § 9.

sýc-ô-phăn'-ize, v. i. [Eng. sycophant; -ize.] To play the sycophant.

"To sycophantize is to play the sycophant, or slander, or accuse falsely, to deal deceitfully."—Blount: Glossographia.

sýc-ô-phăn'-rý, s. [English sycophant; -ry.] Mean or officious tale-bearing or adulation; sycophancy.

"The attempts of envy, of treachery, of flattery, of sycophantry, of avarice, to which his condition is obnoxious."—Barrow: Sermons, vol. iii., ser. 21.

sýc-ô-rêt'-in, s. [Gr. sukon, and rhētinē=resin.]

Chem.: An amorphous, white, neutral resin, obtained from the resin of Ficus rubiginosa by treatment with cold alcohol. It is very brittle and highly electric; is soluble in alcohol, ether, chloroform, and oil of turpentine, and melts in boiling water to a thick liquid, which floats on the surface.

sý-cô'-sís, s. [Gr. sykōsis, from sykon=a fig.]

Pathol.: Ringworm of the beard, produced by a fungal, Microsporon mentagrophytes, and aggravated by the use of alcoholic drinks. It most frequently affects the chin, sometimes spreading to other parts of the face; it is seldom seen on the scalp, and rarely affects women. Attention to cleanliness, the improvement of the general health, and especially the destruction of the parasite by sulphurous acid or by carbolic acid, are the proper remedies. Called also Tinea sycosis and Mentagra. [MICROSPORON.]

sýde, a. [SIDE, a.] Long. (Prov.) sý-dër'-ô-lite, subst. [SIDEROLITE.] A kind of earthenware made in Bohemia, and resembling Wedgwood ware.

"Ye dinna carry yer coats ower syde."—G. MacDonald: Robert Falconer, i. 112.

sý-en'-ite, si'-en'-ite, s. [After Syene, Egypt, where first found; suff. -ite (Petrol.).]

Petrol.: A name originally applied to the granite of Syene, which contains hornblende, but now generally restricted to a rock which consists of orthoclase, felspar and hornblende only; or where quartz is present, only in sufficient quantity to be regarded as an accessory, and not as an essential constituent. By the increase in the amount of quartz, and the presence of mica, syenite graduates into a hornblende granite. Petrologists recognize, as a typical syenite, the rock of Meissen, near Dresden.

Petrol.: A term sometimes used to designate a syenite in which some of the orthoclase is present in large individual crystals, but more frequently applied to a porphyry (felsite) which contains hornblende.

sý-en'-it'-ic, a. [Eng. syenite(e); -ic.]

Petrol.: Partaking of the composition of a syenite. Only applied to certain crystalline rocks which contain hornblende; as, syenitic-granite, syenitic-gneiss.

sýe'-poôr'-ite, s. [After Syepoor, India, where found; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A name given to a granular or minutely crystalline mineral employed by Indian jewelers to give a rose color to gold. Stated to have the composition: Sulphur, 35.2; cobalt, 64.8=100, which would yield the simple formula, CoS. Samples, however, of this mineral from the original locality appear to be cobaltine (q. v.), so that the species is at present a doubtful one.

sý-hê'-drite, s. [After the Syhadree (misspelt Syhedree) Mountains, Bombay, where found; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A green mineral substance found in cavities in a porphyritic amygdaloidal dolerite, of uncertain composition, but supposed to be related to stilbite (q. v.). Named by Shepard.

sýke, sike, s. [Icel. sík=ditch, a trench.] A small rill, commonly running out of a quagmire; a small rill without sand or gravel. (Scotch.)

syke, a. [SICK.]

syke, v. i. [A. S. stican.] To sigh.

sýl-, pref. [The form taken by the Greek prefix syn=with, before words beginning with the letter l.] (See etym.)

sýle, s. [Icel. sil, sili=fish of the herring kind.] The young of the herring. (Prov.) sýl-la-bär'-i-üm (pl. sýl-la-bär'-i-a), s. [Low Lat., from Lat. syllaba=a syllable (q. v.). A catalogue of the primitive syllables of a language.

sýl'-la-bä-rý, s. [Low Lat. syllabarium.] The same as SYLLABARIUM (q. v.).

sýl'-labe, s. [O. Fr., from Lat. syllaba=a syllable (q. v.).] A syllable.

sýl-läb'-ic, sýl-läb'-ic-ál, a. [Gr. syllabikos, from syllabē=a syllable (q. v.); Fr. syllabique.]

1. Pertaining to a syllable or syllables.

2. Consisting of a syllable or syllables; as, syllabic augment.

syllabic-tune, s. A tune in which one note is allotted to one syllable of the words, and hence containing no slurs, as The Old Hundreth.

sýl-läb'-ic-ál-lý, adv. [Eng. syllabical; -ly.] In a syllabic manner; in syllables.

sýl-läb'-i-cäte, v. t. [Eng. syllabe=a syllable; suff. -icate.] To form into syllables.

sýl-läb'-i-cä'-tion, s. [SYLLABICATE.] The act of forming syllables; the act or method of dividing words into syllables.

"A division of the generality of words, as they are actually pronounced, gives us the general laws of syllabication."—Walker: English Dictionary. (Adv.) sýl-läb'-i-fí-cä'-tion, s. [English syllabify; -cation.] The same as SYLLABICATION (q. v.).

"The unaccented parts have lost their distinct syllabification."—Earle: Philology, § 632.

sýl-läb'-i-fý, v. t. [English syllabe*=a syllable; -fy.] To form into syllables.

sýl'-lab-íst, s. [Eng. syllabe*=a syllable; -ist.] One versed in dividing words into syllables.

sýl'-la-bíze, v. t. [Mid. Eng. syllab(e)=syllable; Eng. suff. -ize.] To articulate; to divide into syllables.

"Language frame and syllabize the tone."

Howell: Parly of Beasts. (Pref.)

sýl'-la-ble, sil-la-ble, subst. [O. Fr. sillabe, syllabe, syllable, from Lat. syllaba; Gr. syllabē=that which holds together . . . a syllable: syl, for syn=with, and lambanō=to take, to seize; Sp. silaba; Port. and Ital. sillaba.]

1. A sound, or a combination of sounds uttered together, or at a single effort or impulse of the voice, and constituting a word or part of a word. A syllable may consist of a single vowel, as a in alas, e in ever, &c.; or of a vowel and a consonant, as in go, do, to, at, &c.; or of a combination of consonants with a vowel or diphthong, as strong, out, arm, strands, &c. In English the consonants l and n sometimes form syllables, as in able, fable, prison, reckon, &c., where the final syllables are really l and n. A word is named according to the number of syllables contained in it; thus, a word of one syllable is a monosyllable; of two, a dissyllable; of many syllables, a polysyllable.

2. In printing and writing, a section or part of a word divided from the rest, and capable of being pronounced at one impulse of the voice. It may, or may not, correspond with the syllable of the spoken language.

3. The least expression or particle of language or thought; as, There is not a syllable of truth in the statement.

sýl'-la-ble, v. t. [SYLLABLE, s.] To utter; to articulate.

"Airy tongues that syllable men's names On sands and shores, and desert wildernesses."

Milton: Comus, 208.

sýl'-la-büb, s. [SYLLABUB.]

sýl'-lä-büs, s. [Lat.] [SYLLABLE, s.] A compendium of the heads of a discourse, of a course of lectures, or the like; an abstract, a table of contents, &c.

¶ The Syllabus:

Church Hist.: A list embracing the "chief errors and false doctrines of our most unhappy age," compiled by order of Pope Pius IX., and sent, with an encyclical letter, dated Dec. 8, 1864, "to all the bishops of the Catholic world, in order that these bishops may have before their eyes all the errors and pernicious doctrines which he had reprobated and condemned," the number of which amounts to eighty, probably in imitation of the eighty heresies mentioned by Epiphanius as existing in the first three centuries. The syllabus is divided into ten sections, and attacks Rationalism, Pantheism, Latitudinarianism, Socialism, errors concerning the Church, Society, Natural and Christian Ethics, Marriage, the Power of the Pope, and modern Liberalism.

sýl-lëp'-sís, s. [Gr. =a taking together, from the same root as syllable (q. v.).]

Rhetoric and Grammar:

1. A figure of speech by which we conceive the sense of words otherwise than the words import, and construe them according to the intention of the author; the taking of words in two senses at once, the literal and the metaphorical (as sweeter in the extract.)

"The judgments of the Lord are true and righteous altogether sweeter also than honey and the honeycomb."—Psalms xix. 9, 10.

2. A figure by which one word is referred to another in the sentence to which it does not grammatically belong, as the agreement of a verb or adjective with one rather than another of two nouns, with either of which it might agree; as rex et regina beati.

sýl-lëp'-tíc, sýl-lëp'-tíc-ál, a. [SYLLEPSIS.] Pertaining or relating to, or implying syllepsis.

sýl-lëp'-tíc-ál-lý, adv. [Eng. sylléptical; -ly.] In a sylleptical manner; by way of syllepsis.

sýl'-lî-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. syll(is); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Zoöl.: A family of Errant Annelids, in some classifications separated from the Nereidæ (q. v.). Gen. era: Syllis, Grubea, Dujardinia, and Schmardia.

sýl'-lîs, s. [Gr. psellion=a necklace. (McNicoll).]

Zoöl.: The type-genus of Syllidæ (q. v.). Head bilobed, with four transverse eyes and three thin moniliform tentacles; body elongate, slender, with numerous segments; proboscis without jaws.

sýl'-lô-gîsm, sil-o-gisme, s. [O. Fr. silogisme sillogisme, sylogisme, from Latin sylogismum accus. of sylogismus; Gr. sylogismos=a reckoning together or up, reasoning, syllogism, from sylogizo mai=to reckon together, to reason: syl, for syn=with, together, and logizomai=to reckon; logos=a word, reason, reckoning; Fr. sylogisme.]

Logic:

1. An argument expressed in strict logical form so that its conclusiveness is manifest from the structure of the expression alone, without any regard to the meaning of the terms. (Whately.) In a perfect syllogism there must be three, and not more than three propositions, the last of which, containing the matter to be proved, is called the conclusion; the other two, containing the means by which the conclusion is arrived at, are called the premises. The subject of the conclusion is called the minor term, and its predicate the major term; the third term, with which the minor and major terms are compared in the premises, is called the middle term. The premise which brings into relation the major and the middle terms is called the major premise, and that which brings the minor and middle term into a similar relation is called the minor premise. Thus, in the syllogism:

Major Premise. All A is B.
Minor Premise. All C is A.
Conclusion ∴ All C is B.

B is the major, C the minor, and A the middle term. Substituting words for symbols, Major Premise. All ruminants are quadrupeds.

Minor Premise. All deer are ruminants.
Conclusion ∴ All deer are quadrupeds.

This syllogism is valid, because the conclusion logically follows from the premises. The conclusion is, moreover, true, because the premises from which it logically follows are true.

The figure of a syllogism consists in the situation of the middle term with respect to the major and minor. In the first figure the middle is the subject of the major and the predicate of the minor; in the second it is the predicate, and in the third the subject of both premises; the fourth figure is the reverse of the first, the middle term being the predicate of the major and the subject of the minor. The symbolic names of these figures are commemorated in the following mnemonic hexameters:

1. BarBarA, CEIArEnt, DArII, FErIOque priors.
2. CEsArE, CAmeStrEs, FEstInO, BAROkO, secundæ.
3. Tertia DArAptI, DIIsAmIs. DATIsI, FEIAptOn, BOkArD, FErIsOn, habet.

Quarta insuper addit FrEsIsOn.

The mood of a syllogism depends on the quality (affirmative or negative) and quantity (universal or particular) of its propositions, which are marked thus:

Universal . . . A. Affirmative. E. Negative.
Particular . . . I. Affirmative. O. Negative.

Thus, the vowels of BarBarA denote three Universal Affirmative propositions; of CEIArEnt, a Universal Negative, a Universal Affirmative, and bôll, bôy; pôut, jôwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bençh; go, gem; thin, thîs; sin, aş; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f.

-cian, -tian = shan. -tion, -sion = shün; tion, -sion = zhün. -tious, -cious, -sious = shüş. -ble, -dle, &c. = bêl, dêl.

a Universal Negative; and so on. A syllogism is said to be valid when the conclusion logically follows from the premises; if the conclusion does not so follow, the syllogism is invalid and constitutes a fallacy, if the error deceives the reasoner himself; but if it is advanced with the intention of deceiving others, it constitutes a sophism. The following rules for the construction of syllogisms are those given by Whately:

1. Every syllogism has three, and only three, terms. [UNDISTRIBUTED-MIDDLE.]
2. Every syllogism has three, and only three, propositions.
3. No term must be distributed in the conclusion which was not distributed in one of the premises.
4. From negative premises nothing can be inferred.
5. If one premise be negative the conclusion must be negative.

*2. The act or art of syllogizing, or of reasoning syllogistically.

"A man knows first, and then he is able to prove syllogistically. So that syllogism comes after knowledge, and then a man has little or no need of it."—Locke: Human Understanding, bk. iv., ch. xvii.

syl'-lō-gist-ic, syl'-lō-gist'-ic-al, adj. [Lat. syllogisticus; Gr. syllogistikos.] Pertaining to or consisting of a syllogism, or of the form of reasoning by syllogisms.

"No syllogistical reasoning can be right and conclusive but what has, at least, one general proposition to it."—Locke: Hum. Underst., bk. iv., ch. xvii.

syl'-lō-gist'-ic-al-lŷ, adv. [Eng. syllogistical; -ly.] In a syllogistic manner; in the form of, or by means of syllogism.

"Well; be the consequence what it will, you are attempting to prove your point syllogistically."—Waterland: Works, iii. 21.

syl'-lō-gī-zā-tion, s. [Eng. syllogiz(e); -ation.] A reasoning by means of syllogisms.

"The soul, and its powers both of intuition and syllogization."—Harris: Three Treat., p. 265. (Note.)

syl'-lō-gīze, syl'-lō-gīze, v. i. [Fr. syllogizer; Greek syllogizomai.] [SYLLOGISM.] To reason by means of syllogisms.

"To teach boys to syllogize, or frame arguments and refute them, without any real inward knowledge of the question."—Watts: Logic, pt. iii., ch. ii.

syl'-lō-gīz-ēr, s. [Eng. syllogiz(e); -er.] One who syllogizes; one who reasons by syllogisms.

"Every syllogizer is not presently a match to cope with Bellarmine, Baronius, Stapleton."—Sir E. Dering: Speeches, p. 150.

sylph, s. [Fr. sylphe, from Gr. silphē=a kind of beetle or grub.] An imaginary being inhabiting the air, holding an intermediate place between material and immaterial beings. Sylphs are represented as male and female, having many human characteristics, and as mortal, but without a soul. In modern language the word is used as a feminine, and is applied figuratively to a woman of graceful and slender proportions.

"The gnomes, or demons of earth, delight in mischief; but the sylphs, whose habitation is in the air, are the best conditioned creatures imaginable; for they say, any mortals may enjoy the most intimate familiarities with these gentle spirits upon a condition very easy to all adepts, an inviolate preservation of chastity."—Pope: Letter to Mrs. A. Fermor on the Rape of the Lock.

sylph-like, a. Very graceful and slender.

sylph'-id, s. [Fr. sylphide.] A little or young sylph.

"Ye sylphs and sylphids, to your chief give ear, Fays, fairies, genii, elves, and demons, hear."
Pope: Rape of the Lock, ii. 73.

sylph'-ish, a. [Eng. sylph; -ish.] Having the form and attractiveness of a sylph.

"Fair sylphish forms."

Poetry of Antijacobin, p. 126.

syl'-vā, s. [Lat. =a wood, a forest.]

1. The forest trees of any country or region; a work descriptive of the forest trees of a particular district or country; as, Evelyn's Sylva.

*2. A poetical piece composed in a start or kind of transport.

*3. A collection of poetical pieces of various kinds.

syl'-vān, a. & s. [Lat. sylvanus.]

A. As adjective:

1. Of or pertaining to a wood or forest; forest-like, rural, rustic.

2. Covered or abounding with woods; wooded, shady.

"On as we move, a softer prospect opens—Calm huts, and lawns between, and sylvan slopes."
Wordsworth: Descriptive Sketches.

3. Growing in woods.

B. As subst.: A fabled deity of the woods; a satyr, a fawn.

"From muse or sylvan was he wont to ask,
In phrase poetic, inspiration fair."
Scott: Don Roderick, vi. (Introd.)

syl'-vān-ite, s. [After Sylvan(ium), one of the first proposed names for tellurium; suff. -ite (Min.): Ger. sylvan, sylvanit, schrifterz, schrift-tellur, weiss-sylvanerz, weiss-tellur; Fr. sylvane graphique, tellure auro-argentifère, sylvane blanc.]

Mineralogy:

1. An ore of Tellurium (q. v.). Crystallization, monoclinic, rarely occurring in distinct crystals, but in an aggregation resembling writing characters. Hardness, 1.5-2; specific gravity, 7.9-8.33; luster, metallic; color and streak, steel-gray, sometimes brass-yellow. Composition: Tellurium, 55.8; gold, 28.5; silver, 15.7=100, which corresponds to the formula (AgAu)3Te. Occurs usually associated with gold.

2. The same as TELLURIUM (q. v.).

syl'-vāt'-ic, a. [Lat. sylvaticus, silvaticus.] Of or pertaining to woods or forests; sylvan.

syl'-vēs-tēr, syl'-vēs-trī-al, syl'-vēs-trī-ān, a. [Lat. sylvester, sivester.] Sylvan.

"All beasts domestic and sylvester."—T. Brown: Works, iv. 318.

Syl'-vēs-trī-ānŷ, s. pl. [See def.]

Church Hist. An order of monks, with the rule of St. Benedict, founded by Sylvester, or Silvester, who in 1231 established a monastery called La Grotte, at Monte Fano, in Italy, whence the Sylvestrians were sometimes called the order of Monte Fano. It was approved by Innocent IV. in 1248. Sylvester died in 1267, and was afterward canonized.

syl'-vī-ā, s. [Mod. Lat., from Lat. sylva = a wood.]

1. Astron.: [ASTEROID, 87.]

2. Ornith.: The typical genus of Sylviinæ (q. v.), with eight species, from the Palearctic region to India and Ceylon, and Northeast Africa. Bill rather stout, short; upper mandible decurved from the middle toward the point, which is slightly emarginate; nostrils basal, lateral, oval, and exposed; gape beset with hairs; wings moderate, first primary very short; tail with twelve feathers, generally somewhat rounded, but in some species nearly even; tarsus scaled in front and short, toes and claws short.

syl'-vī-ān, a. [See def.] Of or belonging to Silvi, born in Flanders in 1614, and subsequently Professor of Medicine in Leyden University.

sylvian-fissure, s. [FISSURE, s., ¶ 3.]

syl'-vīc, a. [Lat. sylv(a); -ic.] A synonym of abietic (q. v.).

sylvic-acid, s. [ABIETIC-ACID.]

syl'-vīc'-ō-lā, s. [Lat. sylvicola, silvicola=an inhabitant of woods; sylva, silva=a wood, and colo=to inhabit.]

Ornith.: Fly-catching Warbler, a genus of Parinæ, instituted by Swainson. Bill slender, notched a little way from the tip; rictus weakly bristled; wings long, the first quill nearly or quite as long as the other; feet slender. Chiefly from North America. Species, Sylvicola americana, S. canadensis, &c.

syl'-vī-cūl-ture, subst. [Lat. sylva=a wood, a forest, and cultura=culture (q. v.).] The culture of forest trees; arboriculture, forestry.

syl'-vī'-ī-dæ, syl'-vī'-ā-dæ, s. pl. [Formed from Mod. Lat. sylvia (q. v.), with Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Ornith.: Warblers; a family of Passerine Birds, distinguished from the Thrushes (of which, in some classifications, they form a sub-family) by their delicate structure and more subulate bill. They are almost universally distributed, preponderating greatly in the eastern hemisphere. Canon Tristram divides the family into seven sub-families: Drymœcina, Calamoherpinae, Phylloscopinae, Sylviinæ, Rutilinae, Saxicolinae, and Accentorinae.

syl'-vī'-ī-næ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. sylvi(a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -inæ.]

Ornithology:

1. A sub-family of Turdidæ, approximately equivalent to No. 2.

2. The typical sub-family of Sylviidæ (q. v.), with six genera and thirty-three species; most abundant in the Palearctic region, very scarce in the Australian and Oriental regions; absent from America. [SYLVIA.]

syl'-vine, syl'-vīte, s. [Latin sal digestivus sylvii; suff. -ine, -ite (Min.).]

Min.: An isomeric soluble salt found in large crystals at Stassfurth, Prussia. Hardness, 2.0; specific gravity, 1.9-2; colorless; luster, vitreous. Composition: Potassium, 52.5; chlorine, 47.5=100. equal to the simple formula KCl.

sŷm-, pref. [SYN-]

Sŷ-mā, s. [Gr. Symē, the daughter of Ialysus and Dotis, carried off by Glaucus.]

Ornith.: A genus of Alcedinidæ, with two species from Papua and North Australia.

sŷ-mar', s. [SIMAR.]

sŷm'-bāl, s. [CYMBAL.]

sŷm-bī-ō-sīs, s. [Greek sympiosis=living with companionship; connection: Gr. syn, and bios=life.] Biology: The united life of certain organisms. Some orchids and fungus hyphæ thus obtain nourishment in common. Monotropa hipopitys is said by F. Kamienski to derive its nourishment from the soil through the medium of a fungus mycelium which covers it. The same phenomenon is said to have been observed in oaks, beeches, hornbeams, &c.

sŷm-bī-ōt'-ic, a. [Gr. sympiotēs=one who lives with a companion.]

Biol.: Of or belonging to Symbiosis (q. v.).

sŷm'-bōl, subst. [Fr. symbole=a token, &c., from Lat. symbolum; Gr. symbolon, from symbollo=to throw together; sym, for syn=with, together, and ballō=to throw.]

I. Ordinary Language:

*1. In the Greek sense, a casting together, as of a contribution into a common treasury.

"There are 'portions that are behind of the sufferings' of Christ, which must be filled up by his body the Church; and happy are they that put in the greatest symbol."—J. Taylor: Faith and Patience of the Saints.

*2. Lot; sentence of adjudication.

"The persons who are to be judged . . . shall all appear to receive their symbol."—Taylor: Sermons, vol. i., ser. 1.

3. A letter or character which is significant of something; a sign. [II. 1 ¶.]

4. An object, animate or inanimate, standing for, representing, or calling up something moral or intellectual; an emblem, a figure, a type, a representation.

"Salt, as incorruptible, was the symbol of friendship; which, if it casually fell, was accounted ominous."—Browne: Vulgar Errors.

5. That which specially distinguishes one regarded in a particular character, or as occupying a particular office, and fulfilling its duties; a figure marking the individuality of some being or thing; as, A trident is the symbol of Neptune.

II. Technically:

1. Chem.: An abbreviation of the name of an elementary body: thus C for carbon, H, hydrogen, P, phosphorus, &c. When two or more of the names begin with the same letter, a second letter is added to the symbol of one of these elements for the sake of distinction: thus Cl=chlorine, Hg=hydrargyrum (mercury), Pb=plumbum (lead), &c. The symbol also represents a definite quantity of the element: thus H always=one part by weight of hydrogen, Hg=200 parts of mercury. [BOND, FORMULA, NOMENCLATURE, NOTATION.]

2. Theology:

(1) A primitive name for the Creed, often occurring in the works of the early Fathers. The precise meaning of the word symbol in this sense is doubtful; but it probably had reference to the Creed as the common bond of Faith. The tradition that the name was given because each of the Apostles composed an article, is unsupported by evidence.

(2) Sometimes applied to the elements in the Sacrament of the Eucharist.

¶ Mathematical symbols: There are four kinds of symbols employed in mathematics: (1) Those which stand for quantities; such as letters standing for numbers, time, space, or any of the geometrical magnitudes. (2) Those of relation, as the signs, =, >, : ::, &c., which indicate respectively, the relations of equality, inequality, proportion, &c. (3) Those of abbreviation, as, ∴, for hence, ∵, for because; exponents and coefficients are likewise symbols of abbreviation, the symbol consisting in the manner of writing these numbers. (4) Symbols of operation, or those employed to denote an operation to be performed, or a process to be followed; such are the symbols of algebra and the differential and integral calculus, &c., which do not come under the preceding heads. Those of the third class are generally regarded as symbols of operation. Symbols of operation are of two kinds: (1) Those which indicate invariable processes, and are, in all cases, susceptible of uniform interpretations. This kind includes most of what are usually called the signs of algebra as +, −, ×, ÷, √. (2) Those which indicate general methods of proceeding without reference to the nature of the quantity to be operated upon.

Teleg.: A system of printing in dots and marks or other cipher, as distinct from printing in the usual Roman letter. The dots and dashes of the Morse, or similar systems, may be produced by pressure on, or penetration of the paper (Morse), or by a chemical action at the point of contact of the styles (Bain), or the passage of the electric current, fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camēl, hēr, thēre; pine pīt, sīre, sīr, marīne; gō, pōt, cr, wōre, wōlk, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite. cūr, rāle, fūll; trŷ, Sŷrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu - kw.

sŷm'-bōl, v. t. [SYMBOL, subst.] To express or represent by a symbol; to symbolize.

sŷm-bōl-æ-ōg'-ra-phŷ, s. [Gr. symbolaion=a mark or sign from which one concludes anything, a contract, and graphō=to write.] [SYMBOL.]

Law: The art or cunning of rightly forming and making written instruments. It is either judicial or extra-judicial, the latter being wholly occupied with such instruments as concern matters not yet judicially in controversy, such as instruments of agreements or contracts, and testaments or last wills. (Wharton.)

sŷm-bōl'-a-troŷs, a. [SYMBOLATRY.] Apt or inclined to worship, reverence, or over-estimate symbols or types.

sŷm-bōl'-a-trŷ, s. [Gr. symbolon=a symbol, and latreia=service, worship.] The worship, reverence, or over-estimation of symbols or types.

sŷm-bōl'-ic, a. & s. [Gr. symbolikos; Fr. symbolique.]

A. As adj.: The same as SYMBOLICAL (q. v.).

"The symbolic way of writing is of three kinds; the first is that plain and common one of imitating the figure of the thing represented; the second is by typical marks, and the third is a contrary way, of allegorizing by enigmas."—Warburton: Divine Legation, bk. iv., § 4.

B. As subst.: The same as SYMBOLICS (q. v.).

sŷm-bōl'-ic-āl, a. [Eng. symbolic; -al.]

1. Ord. Lang.: Pertaining to a symbol or symbols; of the nature of a symbol; standing for or serving the purpose of a symbol; representative.

"This seems a clear conclusion from the very nature of our Lord's miracles, which, for the most part, were actions distinctly symbolical of one or other of the spiritual benefits of the redemption."—Bp. Horsley: Sermons, vol. i., ser. 10.

2. Gram.: Applied to words which by themselves present no meaning to any mind, and which depend for their intelligibility on a relation to some presentive word or words. Pronouns, prepositions, conjunctions, and the auxiliary verbs are symbolic words. [PRESENTIVE.]

symbolical-attributes, s. pl.

Art: Certain figures or symbols usually introduced in representations of the evangelists, apostles, saints, &c., as the keys of St. Peter, the lamb of St. Agnes, &c.

symbolical-books, s. pl.

Church Hist.: The writings in which any Christian communion officially publishes its distinctive tenets.

symbolical-delivery, s.

Law: The delivery of property sold or resigned by delivering something else as a symbol, token, or representative of it.

symbolical-philosophy, s. The philosophy expressed by hieroglyphics.

sŷm-bōl'-ic-āl-lŷ, adv. [Eng. symbolical; -ly.] In a symbolical manner; by symbols or signs; typically.

"They likewise worshipped the same deity symbolically in fire."—Cudworth: Intell. System, p. 286.

sŷm-bōl'-ic-āl-nēss, s. [Eng. symbolical; -ness.] The quality or state of being symbolical.

sŷm-bōl'-ics, s. [SYMBOLIC.]

1. The study of the symbols and the mysterious rites of antiquity.

2. The study of the history and contents of Christian creeds and confessions of faith.

sŷm'-bōl'-ism, s. [Eng. symbol; -ism.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The investing of things, as certain practices in ritual, with a symbolic meaning; the regarding of outward things as having an inner and symbolic meaning; the representing of events by causes or types; such as the sword, the cause of death; the palm, the type of victory, &c.

"Symbolism [is] the name applied to the system which invested the forms of Christian architecture and ritual with a symbolical meaning. The extent to which this symbolism was carried has been a subject of much controversy."—Brandes and Cox.

*2. An exposition or comparison of symbols or creeds.

II. Gram.: The quality or state of being symbolic (q. v.).

sŷm'-bōl'-ist, s. [Eng. symbol; -ist.] One who symbolizes; one who employs symbols.

sŷm-bōl'-ist'-ic, sŷm-bōl'-ist'-ic-āl, a. [Eng. symbol; -istic, -istical.] Characterized by the use of symbols; as, symbolistic poetry.

sŷm-bōl'-i-zā'-tion, subst. [Eng. symboliz(e); -ation.] The act of symbolizing; representation; resemblance.

"Of-times wrackt beyond their symbolizations, enlarged into constructions disparaging their true intentions."—Browne: Vulgar Errors, bk. v., ch. xxi.

sŷm'-bōl-ize, v. t. & i. [Fr. symboliser.] [SYMBOL, s.]

A. Transitive:

1. To represent by a symbol or symbols.

2. To regard or treat as symbolic; to make symbolic or representative of something.

"There want not some who have symbolized the apple of Paradise into such constructions."—Browne: Vulgar Errors, bk. vii., ch. i.

*3. To make to agree in properties.

B. Intransitive:

1. To use symbols; to express or represent things in symbols or symbolically.

*2. To agree, to harmonize; to have a resemblance in qualities or properties.

"The Orphick philosophy did really agree and symbolize with that which afterward was called Pythagorick and Platonic."—Cudworth: Intell. System, p. 299.

*3. To hold the same faith or religious belief; to agree in faith.

sŷm'-bōl'-iz-ēr, s. [Eng. symboliz(e); -er.] One who symbolizes; one who casts in his vote, opinion, &c., with another.

"Their ambitious symbolizers in England."—Gauden: Tears of the Church, p. 591.

sŷm-bō-lōg'-ic-āl, adj. [English symbolog(y); -ical.] Of or pertaining to symbolology (q. v.).

sŷm-bōl'-ō-gist, s. [Eng. symbolog(y); -ist.] One versed in symbolology (q. v.).

sŷm-bōl'-ō-gŷ, s. [Gr. symbolon=a symbol, and logos=a word, a discourse.] The art of expressing by symbols; symbolization.

sŷm'-bō-lŷm (pl. sŷm'-bō-lā), s. [SYMBOL, s.] A contribution.

"My symbolum towards so charitable a work."—Hammond: Paraphrase on the Psalms. (Pref.)

sŷm-bōr'-ō-dōn, s. [Pref. sym-; Gr. boros=glutinous, and suff. -odon.]

Palæont.: A genus of Perissodactyla, founded by Cope, on remains from the Miocene of North America. It approximately corresponds to Marsh's genus Brontotherium (q. v.).

sŷm-brān'-chī-dæ, subst. pl. [Mod. Lat. symbranch(us); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Ichthy.: A family of Physostomi (q. v.); eel-like fishes, having the body naked or covered with minute scales; the upper jaw is entirely formed by the premaxillary bones, the maxillaries being placed behind them in a parallel position. Pectoral and ventral fins are absent, and the vertical fins are reduced to membranous folds; there is no swimming-bladder, and the stomach is without pyloric appendages. The family is divided into the three following groups, the first two of which are freshwater, but sometimes entering brackish water; the third is marine:

1. AMPHIPNOINA, containing one genus, with a single species, Amphipnoia cuchia, from Bengal.

2. SYMBRANCHINA, with two genera, Monopterus and Symbranchus (q. v.).

3. CHILORANCHINA, containing one genus, with a single species, Chilobranchus dorsalis, from Australia and Tasmania.

sŷm-brān'-chī-na, subst. pl. [Mod. Latin symbranch(us); Lat. neut. pl. adj. suff. -ina.] [SYMBRANCHIDÆ, 2.]

sŷm-brān'-chŷs, s. [Mod. Lat., from pref. sym-, and Gr. branchia=gills.]

Ichthy.: The typical genus of the group Symbranchina, and the family Symbranchidæ (q. v.). Vent in the posterior half of the body, which is naked; four branchial arches, with well-developed gills. Two species: Symbranchus marmoratus, common in tropical America, and S. bengalensis, common in the East Indies.

Sŷm-mäch'-i-aņš, s. pl. [See def.]

Eccles. History: A name sometimes given to the Nazarenes, probably from Symmachus the Ebionite, who is mentioned by Eusebius (Hist. Eccles., vi. 17). St. Ambrose (died 397), however, speaks of the Symmachians as descended from the Pharisees, and the sect was in existence in the time of St. Augustine of Hippo (354-430).

sŷm-mēt'-rāl, a. [SYMMETRY.] Commensurate, symmetrical.

"It was both the doctrine of the apostles, and the practice of the church, while it was symmetrāl, to obey the magistrate."—More: Mystery of Godliness, p. 204.

sŷm-mēt'-rī-aņ, subst. [Eng. symmetry; -an.] One studious of proportion or symmetry of parts.

"His face was a thought longer than the exact symmetrians would allow."—Sidney: Arcadia.

sŷm-mēt'-rīc-āl, sŷm-mēt'-rīc, a. [English symmetr(y); -ic, -ical.]

I. Ord. Lang.: Possessing, exhibiting, or characterized by symmetry; well-proportioned in its parts; having its parts in due proportion as to dimensions.

II. Technically:

1. Bot. (of the parts of a flower): Related to each other in number, the same in number, or one a multiple of the other, as in Saxifraga, which has five divisions of the calyx, five petals, and five stamens; or Epilobium, which has a four-parted calyx, four petals, and eight stamens.

2. Math.: Possessing the attribute of symmetry; having corresponding parts or relations. In geometry, two points are symmetrically disposed with respect to a straight line, when they are on opposite sides of the line and equally distant from it, so that a straight line joining them intersects the given line, and is at right angles to it. A curve is symmetrical with respect to a straight line, when for each point on one side of the line there is a corresponding point on the other side, and equally distant from it. The line is called an axis of symmetry. In conic sections, the axes are the only true axes of symmetry. Two plane figures are symmetrically situated with respect to a straight line, when each point of one has a corresponding point in the other on the opposite side of the axis, and equally distant from it. A line or surface is symmetrical with respect to a plane, when for each point on one side of the plane there is a second point on the other side, equally distant from it. The plane is called the plane of symmetry, and is, in conic sections, a principal plane. Symmetrical lines and surfaces in space cannot, in general, be made to coincide with each other. Spherical triangles are symmetrical when their sides and angles are equal each to each, but not similarly situated. In analysis, an expression is symmetrical with respect to two letters, when the places of these letters may be changed without changing the expression. Thus, the expression $x^2 + a^2x + ab + b^2x$ is symmetrical with respect to a and b ; for, if we change the place of a and b , we have $x^2 + b^2x + ba + a^2x$, the same expression. An expression is symmetrical with respect to several letters, when any two of them may change places without affecting the expression; thus, the expression $ab + ba^2 + a^2c + c^2a + b^2c + bc^2$, is symmetrical with respect to the three letters, a, b, c .

sŷm-mēt'-rīc-āl-lŷ, adv. [Eng. symmetrical; -ly.] In a symmetrical manner; with due proportion of parts.

sŷm-mēt'-rīc-āl-nēss, s. [Eng. symmetrical; -ness.] The quality or state of being symmetrical.

sŷm-mē-trī'-cian, subst. [Eng. symmetr(y); -ician.] The same as SYMMETRIAN (q. v.).

"Sith the longest rib is commonlie about the fourth part of a man, as some rouring symmetricians affirme."—Holinshead: Descrip. Britaine, ch. i.

sŷm'-mē-trīst, s. [Eng. symmetr(y); -ist.] One who is studious or particular about symmetry or due proportion of parts; a symmetrian.

"This is the clearest reason why some exact symmetrists have been blamed for being too true."—Reliquiæ Wottonianæ, p. 56.

sŷm'-mē-trīze, v. t. [Eng. symmetr(y); -ize.] To make symmetrical or proportional in its parts; to reduce to symmetry.

"He would soon have supplied every deficiency, and symmetrized every disproportion."—Burke.

sŷm'-mē-trŷ, sim-me-trie, sym-me-trie, s. [O. Fr. symétrie (Fr. symétrie), from Lat. symmetria; Gr. symmetria=due proportion, from symmetros=of like measure with: sym for syn=with, and metron=a measure.]

I. Ord. Lang.: A due proportion of the several parts of a body to each other; adaptation of parts to each other; union and conformity of the members of a work to the whole proportion; harmony.

"Her motions' grace it could not hide,

Nor could her form's fair symmetry."

Scott: Lord of the Isles, ii. 8.

II. Technically:

1. Botany:

(1) A term used when the four verticils constituting a flower alternate with each other. The symmetry may be dimerous, trimerous, tetramerous, or pentamerous; i. e., the number of pieces composing each verticil may be two, as in Circœa; three, as in Iris; four, as in Cœnothra; or five, as in Convolvulus. The symmetry may be marked by the multiplication, the deduplication, the union, the arrest of, or the inequality in, the development of the several parts.

(2) An arrangement by which every part is balanced by some other one, as that one pair of leaves is balanced by the next.

2. Compar. Anat.: Harmony and correspondence between certain parts of the body of an animal. Symmetry may be:

(1) Bilateral: As in the arms of man, the wings of a bird, and the pectoral fins of a fish. This correspondence is purely external, and its absence is immediately noticed on an examination of the viscera.

bōil, bōy; pōut, jōwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, ðis; sin, aš; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f. -cian, -tian = şan. -tion, -sion = şŷn; -tion, -şion = zhŷn. -tious, -cious, -sious = şŷs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bel, del.

(2) Serial: As the correspondence between the arm and leg in man, and the fore and hind legs of a horse, though this is not obvious without examination, owing to the different directions in which the knee and elbow are bent. On dissection, however, serial symmetry is seen to persist internally, as in the ribs and vertebrae, which are placed one after another in a series.

†(3) Zonal: A name sometimes applied to the serial symmetry of segmented animals.

†(4) [RADIATED-SYMMETRY.]

¶ Uniform symmetry:

Arch.: That disposition of parts in which the same ordonnance reigns throughout the whole.

sým-mor'-phūs, s. [Gr. symmorphos=conformed to, similar.]

Ornith.: A genus of Campephagidae, with one species, Symmorphus leucopygus, from Australia.

sým-pa-thět'-íc, sým-pa-thět'-íc-ál*, adj. [Formed from sympathy (q. v.), on analogy of pathetic (q. v.).]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Pertaining to, characterized by, expressive of, or produced by sympathy.

"To sympathetic tears the ghosts themselves
He moved; these praises to his verse he owes."
Cowper: To his Father.

2. Having sympathy or common feeling with another; affected by feelings like those of another, or susceptible of feelings in consequence of what another feels.

"Your sympathetic hearts she hopes to move From tender friendship and endearing love."
Prior: Epilogue to Mrs. Manley's Lucius.

3. Agreeing, or in accord with the feelings experienced by another; in harmony and concord.

"Now o'er the soothed accordant heart we feel A sympathetic twilight slowly steal." Wordsworth: Country Walk.

4. Causing or attended with sympathy.

"For cold reserve had lost its power,
In sorrow's sympathetic hour."
Scott: Rokeby, v. 11.

II. Physiol. & Pathol.: Produced by or arising from sympathy.

sympathetic-ink, s. A colorless ink, the writing made with which is made visible by a subsequent operation—warmth, or other reacting stimulant.

Anthrop.: An old method of treatment based on magic, and owing its origin, in every case, to the fact that a subjective connection between the malady or injury and the means of cure was mistaken for a real and objective connection. Well-known examples of this mode of treatment are Sir Kenelm Digby's Sympathetic Powder (q. v.), the Doctrine of Signatures, and the practice of Chinese physicians at the present day, who, in the absence of a necessary drug, will write the prescription on a piece of paper and administer an infusion of the writing in water, or the ashes of the burnt paper, to the sick man. Dryden, in his version of the Tempest (v. 2), introduces this treatment by sympathy; and how closely it is connected with magic may be seen in the Lay of the Last Minstrel (ii. 22), where the Lady Margaret acts as leech to the wounded William of Deloraine:

"She drew the splinter from the wound,
And with a charm she stanch'd the blood."

Then, taking the broken lance, she "Washed it from the clotted gore, And salv'd the splinter o'er and o'er."

Anatomy: A nerve, or system of nerves, running from the base of the skull to the coccyx, along both sides of the body, and consisting of a series of ganglia along the spinal column by the side of the vertebrae. With this trunk of the sympathetic there are communicating branches which connect the ganglia, or the intermediate cord, with all the spinal and several of the cranial nerves proceeding to primary branches on the neighboring organs or other ganglia, and finally numerous flexures of nerves running to the viscera. Various fibers from the sympathetic communicate with those of the cerebro-spinal system. The term sympathetic has been applied on the supposition that it is the agent in producing sympathy between different parts of the body. It more certainly affects the secretions. Called also Sympathetic system.

Old Med.: Powder of Sympathy. A powder of vitriol, introduced by Sir Kenelm Digby (1603-65), who published a small book (A Late Discourse, &c.) on its merits, and made known the method of its preparation in his Chymical Secrets (p. 270). The powder was said to be highly efficacious "in stanching of desperate bleeding at the nose, in stanching the blood of a wound, and in curing any green wound (where there is no fracture of bones) without any plaster or ointment, in a few days." In the case of an incised wound, the powder was infused in water, and "into this water they did put a clout or rag of cloth embued with the blood of the party hurt (the rag being first dry), but if it was fresh and moist with the reeking blood, there was no need but to powder it with the small powder of the same vitriol" (p. 138). Sir Kenelm (p. 148) goes on to say that "the same cure is performed by applying the remedy to the blade of a sword which hath wounded a person." The wound itself was to be washed clean, the edges brought into apposition and bandaged. Dunglison (Hist. Med., p. 237) hereupon remarks: "Under such treatment it was of little importance what application was made to the instrument; binding up the wound, bringing the edges in apposition, defending it from extraneous irritants, and leaving it to the restorative power which is seated in almost every part of an organized body, is the approved method of managing incised wounds at the present day."

sympathetic-sounds, s. pl. Sounds produced from solid bodies by means of vibrations of some sounding body, these vibrations being communicated by means of the air or some intervening solid body.

sympathetic-strike, s. A labor strike carried out by other crafts than the one primarily concerned, to the end that the first strike may be forced to a successful issue by a general cessation of business till the point in dispute in the initial strike may be decided. Of such a character was the great railroad strike in this country in 1894, when the railroad employes struck in sympathy with the Pullman Car Company's employes.

sým-pa-thět'-íc-ál-lý, adv. [Eng. sympathetically; -ly.] In a sympathetic manner; with sympathy; in consequence of sympathy; by communication from something else.

"Wherefore the plastic nature . . . must be concluded to act fatally, magically, and sympathetically."—Cudworth: Intell. System, p. 161.

sým'-pa-thíst*, s. [Eng. sympath(y); -ist.] One who sympathizes; one who feels sympathy; a sympathizer.

sým'-pa-thíze, v. i. & t. [French sympathiser.] [SYMPATHY.]

A. Intransitive:

1. To have sympathy; to have a common feeling with another, as of pain or pleasure.

"The limbs of his body is to every one a part of himself; he sympathizes and is concerned for them."—Locke: Human Understanding, bk. ii., ch. xxvii.

2. To feel in consequence of what another feels; to feel mutually; to be affected with feelings similar to those of another, in consequence of something felt or experienced by such other.

"We continually sympathize with the sentiments and affections of the company among whom we converse."—Search: Light of Nature, vol. i., pt. ii., ch. xix.

3. To express sympathy; to condole.

"To feel her woes and sympathize in tears."
Pitt: Vida; Art of Poetry, ii.

*A. To agree, to fit, to harmonize.

"Green is a pleasing color, from a blue and a yellow mixed together, and by consequence blue and yellow are two colors which sympathize."—Dryden: Dufresnoy.

*5. To agree; to be of the same disposition.

"The men do sympathize with the mastiffs in robustious and rough coming on."—Shakesp.: Henry V., iii. 7.

B. Transitive:

1. To have sympathy for; to share, to participate.

"By this sympathized one day's error Have suffered wrong."

Shakesp.: Comedy of Errors, v.

2. To form so as to harmonize; to form with suitable adaptation; to contrive with congruity or consistency.

"A message well sympathized; a horse to be ambassador for an ass."—Shakesp.: Love's Labor's Lost, iii.

sým'-pa-thíz-ēr, s. [Eng. sympathiz(e); -er.] One who sympathizes or feels for another; one who takes side or common action with another in any cause or pursuit.

sým'-pa-thý, sym-pa-thie*, s. [Fr. sympathie, from Lat. sympathia; Gr. sympatheia=like feeling, fellow-feeling; sympathēs=of like feelings: sym (for syn)=with, and pathein, 2 aor infin. of paschō=to suffer.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Feeling corresponding to that felt by another; the quality or state of being affected by the affections of another, with feelings corresponding in kind if not in degree; compassion, fellow-feeling, commiseration. (Followed by for before the person sympathized with.)

"Pleased it returned as soon with answering looks Of sympathy and love." Milton: P. L., iv. 465.

¶ Sympathy is first evoked in small societies, such as a single family or a small tribe, and gradually extends beyond these limits. After a time it is found capable of embracing a nation, but foreigners excite antipathy rather than sympathy. Next it entertains a certain amount of beneficent feeling toward mankind in general. One of its latest moral acquisitions is to go forth toward the lower animals, as shown, for example, by the efforts to prevent their being cruelly and thoughtlessly treated. The latter possess it among themselves; thus Indian crows have been seen feeding two or three of their companions which were blind.

2. An agreement of affections or inclinations; a conformity of natural temperament, which makes two persons pleased or in accord with each other; mutual or reciprocal affection or passion; community of inclination or disposition. (Followed by with.)

"It was an assemblage of distinct bodies, none of which had any strong sympathy with the rest, and some of which had a positive antipathy for each other."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xxiv.

*3. Correspondence, agreement.

"His Impresa was a Catoblepas, which so long lies dead, as the moon, whereto it hath so natural a sympathy, wants a light."—Sidney: Arcadia, bk. iii.

4. A tendency of certain inanimate things to unite with or act on each other; as, the sympathy between the loadstone and iron.

II. Physiology and Pathology:

1. Reciprocal action of the different parts of the body on each other; an affection of one part of the body in consequence of something taking place in another. Thus, when there is a local injury the whole frame after a time suffers with it. A wound anywhere will tend to create feverishness everywhere; derangement of the stomach will produce headache, liver complaint will produce pain in the shoulder, &c.

2. The influence exerted over the susceptible organization of one person, as of a hysteric female, by the sight of paroxysms of some nervous disease in another or in others.

¶ According to the derivation of the words, sympathy may be said of either pleasure or pain; compassion and condolence only of that which is painful. Sympathy preserves its original meaning in its application, for we laugh or cry by sympathy; this may, however, be merely a physical operation; but compassion is altogether a moral feeling, which makes us enter into the distresses of others; we may, therefore, sympathize with others, without essentially serving them; but if we feel compassion we naturally turn our thoughts toward relieving them. Compassion is awakened by those sufferings which are attributable to our misfortunes; compassion may be awakened by persons in very unequal conditions of life; condolence supposes an entire equality.

sým-pěp'-sís, s. [Pref. sym-, and Gr. pepsis=a ripening.]

Med.: A ripening of inflammatory humors.

†sým-pět'-a-lous, a. [Pref. sym-, and Gr. petalon=a leaf.]

Bot.: Gamopetalous (q. v.). (Thomé.)

sým-ph-ăn'-thēr-oūs, adj. [Greek symphora=a bringing together, and anthēros.] [ANTHER.]

Bot.: Syngenesious (q. v.).

sým-phě-nôm'-ăn-a, s. pl. [Pref. sym-, and pl. of Eng. phenomenon (q. v.).] Natural sounds or appearances of a kind or character similar to others expressed or exhibited by the same object. (Stormonth.)

sým-phě-nôm'-ăn-ál, a. [SYMPHENOMENA.] Of or pertaining to symphenomena; designating significant words imitative of natural sounds or phenomena. (Stormonth.)

sým-phō'-nī-a, s. [Lat.] A symphony (q. v.).

sým-phōn'-íc, a. [SYMPHONY.]

1. Ord. Lang.: The same as SYMPHONIOUS (q. v.).

2. Music: Pertaining or relating to or characteristic of a symphony.

"In presence of a symphonic poem there is a 'craving of the human mind' to know what it is all about."—London Daily Telegraph.

sým-phō'-nī-oūs, adj. [Eng. symphony; -ous.]

1. Ord. Lang.: Agreeing in sound; harmonious.

"The sound
Symphonious of ten thousand harps, that tuned Angelic harmonies." Milton: P. L., vii. 559.

2. Music: The same as SYMPHONIC (q. v.).

sým-phō-níst, s. [Fr. symphoniste.]

*1. A chorister. (Blount.)

2. A composer of symphonies, as Beethoven, Mozart, and Haydn.

sým-phō-níze*, v. i. [Eng. symphon(y); -ize.] To agree, to harmonize.

"I mean the law and the prophets symphonizing with the gospel."—Boyle: Style of Holy Scripture, p. 253.

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camēl, hēr, thēre; pīne, pīt, sīre, sīr, marīne; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rāle, fūll; trȳ, Sȳrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw, sým-phō-nŷ, *sim-pho-nie, *sóm-fo-nye, *sym-pho-nie, s. [Fr. symphonie, from Lat. symphonia; Gr. symphōnia=music, harmony, from sympōnos=agreeing in sound; harmonious; sym, for syn=with, and phōnē=sound.]

I. Ord. Lang.: A consonance or harmony of sounds, vocal or instrumental, or both, which are agreeable to the ear.

II. Music:

1. A composition for an orchestra, similar in construction to the sonata, which is usually for a single instrument. A symphony has several varied movements, generally four, never less than three. The first, an allegro; the second, a largo, or andante; the third, a scherzo, or minuet and trio; and the fourth, an allegro. The form of the first and last movement is usually the same as that of the sonata. The scherzo, or the minuet, in some symphonies is placed before, instead of after, the slow movement.

2. Formerly overtures were called symphonies. Handel called the overture "Sinfonica," and it was a common practice in his time to name any long instrumental piece after this manner.

3. The introductory, intermediate, and concluding instrumental parts of a song or other vocal piece are also called symphonies.

*4. A name anciently given to certain musical instruments, as the virginal and bagpipe.

sým-phōr'-i-a, s. [Greek symphora=a bringing together.]

Bot.: The same as SYMPHORICARPUS (q. v.).

sým-phōr-i-car'-pōus, a. [Greek symphora=a bringing together, and karpos=fruit.]

Bot.: Bearing fruits clustered together.

sým-phōr-i-car'-pūs, s. [SYMPHORICARPUS. Named from the cluster of berries.]

Bot.: St. Peter's wort, a genus of Lonicereæ, with a four-celled ovary, having two cells abortive, and the other two each with one hard seed. North American shrubs: Symphoricarpos racemosus is the Snow-berry (q. v.); S. vulgaris the common St. Peter's wort, a native of the United States, which has red cup-shaped berries.

sým-phōr-ūs, s. [Gr. symphoros=useful, profitable.]

Ichthyology: A genus of Percidæ, from the Indo-Pacific, closely allied to Dentex (q. v.), which is now generally placed with the Percidæ.

sým-phŷl'-lōūs, a. [Pref. sym-, and Gr. phyllon=a leaf.]

Bot.: Gamophyllous (q. v.).

sým-phŷ-ō-stē-mōn, s. [Gr. symphyō=to cause to grow together, and stēmōn.] [STAMEN.]

Bot.: The union of stamens by their filaments; the state of being monadelphous.

sým-phŷs-ān'-droūs, a. [Greek symphysis, and anēr (genit. andros)=a male.]

Bot. (of stamens): In a state of coalescence, as the filaments and anthers of Cucurbitacæ and Lobeliacæ.

sým-phŷs'-ē-āl, adj. [Eng. symphysis (is); -eal.]

Of or pertaining to symphysis (q. v.).

sým-phŷs'-ē-ō-tōme, s. [Eng. symphysis (q. v.), and Gr. tomē=a cutting.]

Surg.: A knife used in the Sigaultian section.

sým-phŷs'-ē-ōt'-ō-mŷ, s. [SYMPHYSEOTOME.]

Surg.: The Sigaultian section (q. v.).

sým-phŷ-sŷs, s. [Gr.=a growing together: sym, for syn=together, and physis=a growing; phyō=to grow.]

1. Anat.: The union of two bones, in which there is little or no motion.

2. Bot.: The growing together or union of two parts.

sým-phŷt-ŷm, s. [Greek symphyō=to grow together.] [SYMPHYSIS.]

Philol.: A term applied by Earle to a tendency, in that class of words called by him symbolic, to attach themselves to other words, so that the resulting compound is either really one word, or presents the appearance of being one word. Symphytism is of two kinds, (1) Particle-composition and (2) Flexion.

(1) Particle-composition is when the old negative ne coalesces with the verb; thus, nelt for ne wilt, nam for ne am, not=ne wot. Also when the particle a coalesces with a noun; as, awinter=in the winter, or with an adjective, as abroad, around, along.

(2) Flexion is when a change of this kind gives any word a grammatical flexibility, a faculty of changing its relative office, a parsing value; as, theech=thee ic=so may I prosper (A. S. theon=to prosper). (Earle: Philology of the English Tongue, § 254.)

sým-phŷ-tŷm, s. [Greek symphyton=comfrey (see def.); symphytos=grown together. Named from its supposed vulnerary qualities.]

Bot.: Comfrey, a genus of Boraginacæ, tribe Anchuseæ. Hispid plants, with the cauline leaves sessile or decurrent; the inflorescence in terminal forked cymes; calyx five-partite or five-toothed; corolla tubular, enlarged upward, its throat closed with connivent, lanceolate, subulate scales; stamens five; nutlets four, ovoid, smooth. Known species, fifteen, from America, Europe and the West of Asia. [COMFREY, ¶ (1), (5).] S. orientale, the Eastern, and S. asperillum, the Roughest Comfrey, are found, but not wild, in European shrubberies.

sým-pi-ēs-ōm'-ē-tēr, s. [Greek sympiesis=a compression, from sympiezō=to press together, (sym, for syn=with, together, and piezō=to press), and metron=a measure.] An instrument invented by Mr. Adie, of Edinburgh, Scotland, for measuring the weight of the atmosphere by the compression of a column of gas. It consists of a column of oil, supported by atmospheric pressure, and rising, not like the mercury of the barometer into a vacuum, but against a body of hydrogen gas, which acts like a spring against the column of oil; and as the elasticity of the hydrogen varies with every change of temperature, a movable thermometer-scale is attached for making the necessary corrections. The sympiesometer is graduated by placing it together with a standard barometer and thermometer in a glass vessel, in which the pressure of the air can be varied at pleasure. The top of the column is marked at the points where the barometer shows 27, 28, 29, 30, 31 inches respectively. The spaces between the marks, coinciding with the inches of mercury, are then subdivided into 100 equal parts each, and the great range makes the instrument valuable for recording minute variations, subject to correction, depending on the variation in the volume of the hydrogen, due to changes of the temperature. A graduated sliding scale assists in reaching the corrected result.

sým-plē-sīte, s. [Gr. sym, for syn=together, and plēsiazō=to approach.]

Min.: A monoclinic mineral, occurring in tufts of small prismatic crystals in cavities in Siderite (q. v.). Hardness, 2.5; specific gravity, 2.957; luster on cleavage face, pearly, elsewhere vitreous; color, celadine-green. Composition: Supposed to be an arsenate of protoxide of iron.

sým-plō-car'-pūs, s. [Gr. symplokē=an interweaving, and karpos=fruit.]

Bot.: A genus of Orontiacæ. Leaves large, stalked; spathe cucullate; spadix globular, covered with perfect flowers; perianth four-parted, at last fleshy; stamens four; style four-angled; ovary one-celled; fruit confluent, one-celled, one-seeded. Symplocarpus fetidus, or Pothos fetida, so called from its fetid smell, is a powerful antispasmodic and expectorant; it is valued as a palliative in paroxysms of asthma.

sým-plō-çē, subst. [Gr. symplokē=a twisting together: sym, for syn=with, together, and plokē=a twisting; plekō=to twist, to twine.]

Rhet.: The repetition of one word at the beginning and of another at the end of successive clauses, as in the sentence, Mercy descended from heaven to dwell on the earth; Mercy fled back to heaven, and left the earth.

sým-plō-çē-æ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. symplocos; Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -eæ.]

Bot.: A tribe of Styracacæ, having the corolla quincuncial and the anthers roundish.

sým-plō-çī-um, s. [Mod. Lat. dimin. from Gr. symplokē.] [SYMPLOCE.]

Bot.: The spore case of a fern.

sým-plō-cōs, s. [SYMPLOCE.]

Bot.: The typical genus of Symplocæ (q. v.). Leaves alternate, exstipulate; flowers axillary; calyx half-inferior, three-parted; corolla monopetalous, three to ten-parted, white or scarlet; stamens indefinite; ovary three to five-celled, each cell with four ovules; fruit, a drupe, with three to five cells each, one-seeded. Known species about thirty. The leaves and bark of Symplocos crataegoides yield a yellow dye; its seeds furnish an oil; its bark is considered tonic, and is used in India in ophthalmia. The leaves of S. spicata are also used for dyeing; the bark with indigo to produce different shades of green. The red wood from the root of S. phyllo-calyx is used by the Nepaulese for caste marks; its root and leaves yield a yellow dye. The ashes of S. racemosa are employed as an alkali, as an auxiliary with other dyes, or as a tan. Its bark is cooling and astringent. It is given in India in diarrhoea, and is employed in making plaisters. Mixed with sugar it acts on relaxed mucous membranes. A decoction of the wood is made into a gargle for spongy bleeding gums. All these are trees from the Himalayas, or other Indian mountains. The bark of S. (Bobua) laurina is used in Bengal as a mordant for a red dye. S. tinctoria, the Sweetleaf of Carolina, dyes yellow, and has a bitter and aromatic root. S. alstonia, or Alstonia theæfolia, from New Granada, is astringent. Its leaves are used as tea.

2. Palæobot.: The genus occurs in the London clay of Sheppey, England.

sým-pō-dī-āl, a. [Mod. Latin sympodi(um); Eng. suff. -al.]

Bot. (Of inflorescence): Cymose.

sým-pō-dī-ūm, s. [Pref. sym-, and Gr. podion, dimin. from pous (genit. podos)=a foot.]

Bot.: (1) A cyme; (2) a lateral branch in the inflorescence of rushes. It consists of several axes.

sým-pōs'-i-a, s. pl. [SYMPOSIUM.]

sým-pōs'-i-äck, *sým-pōs'-i-äck, a. & s. [Fr. symposiaque, from Lat. symposiacus; Gr. symposiakos=of or pertaining to a symposium (q. v.).]

A. As adjective:

1. Ord. Lang.: Pertaining to symposia, merry-making, or revels; happening where company is drinking together.

"From the ancient custom of symposiack meetings to wear cheap chaplets of roses about their heads."—Browne: Vulgar Errors, bk. v., ch. xxi.

2. Music: A term applied to cheerful and convivial compositions for voices, as glees, catches, rounds, &c.

*B. As subst.: A conference or conversation of philosophers at a banquet.

sým-pōs'-i-arch, s. [Gr. symposiarchēs, from symposion=a symposium (q. v.), and archō=to rule.] Gr. Antiq.: The president, chairman, or director of a feast.

sým-pōs'-i-äst, s. [Gr. symposiastēs.] [SYMPOSIUM.] One who joins in a symposium or merry-making.

sým-pōs'-i-ūm, *sým-pōs'-i-ōn (pl. sým-pōs'-i-a), s. [Latin, from Greek symposion=a drinking party, a banquet; sum, for syn=with, together, and base po-, seen in posis=a drinking; pinō=to drink, pa. t. pepōka, aor. epothēn.]

1. A drinking together; a revel, a merry-making, a banquet.

2. A magazine article, or compilation in bookform of short essays on some serious topic, in which several contributors express their views in succession, like the speakers in Plato's Banquet.

sým-p-tōm (p silent), *symp-tome, *sym-tome, s. [Fr. symptome, from Lat. symp-toma; Gr. symp-tōma=anything that befalls one, a casualty; symp-tō=to fall together, to fall in with; sym, for syn=together, and pīptō=to fall.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. In the same sense as II.

"The physicians speak of a certain disease or madness, called hydrophobia, the symptoms of those that have been bitten by a mad-dog, which makes them have a monstrous antipathy to water."—Cudworth: Intell. System, p. 135.

2. Something which indicates the existence of something else; a token, a sign, an omen, an indication.

"Alarming symptoms had appeared in other regiments."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xi.

II. Pathol.: A change perceptible by a patient or his physician in the appearance or functions of the body, indicating the presence of disease.

sým-p-tō-māt'-ic, sým-p-tō-māt'-ic-āl (p silent), adj. [Greek symp-tōmatikos, from symp-tōma (genit. symp-tōmatos)=a symptom (q. v.); French symptomatique.]

1. Of or pertaining to symptoms.

2. Being or serving as a symptom, token, sign, or indication; indicating the existence of something else.

"The one is but symptomatical, or at most secondary, in relation to the other."—Boyle: Works, ii. 197.

3. Made or arranged according to symptoms; as, a symptomatic classification of diseases.

symptomatic-disease, s.

Med.: A disease which proceeds from a prior disease in some part of the body; as, A symptomatic fever may proceed from a local injury or local inflammation. (Opposed to idiopathic.)

sým-p-tō-māt'-ic-āl-lŷ (p silent), adv. [Eng. symptomatical; -ly.] In a symptomatic manner; by means of symptoms; in the nature of symptoms.

"The causes of a bubo are vicious humors abounding in the blood, or in the nerves, excreted sometimes critically, sometimes symptomatically."—Wiseman: Surgery, bk. i., ch. ix.

sým-p-tō-mā-tōl'-ō-gŷ (p silent), subst. [Greek symp-tōmatos (genit. of symp-tōma)=a symptom, and logos=a discourse.]

Med.: The doctrine of symptoms, including diagnosis and prognosis. (See these words.)

syn*, syne*, adv. [SINCE.]

sŷn-ăc'-mîc, a. [Eng. synacm(y); -ic.]

Botany: Of or belonging to synacmy, having the stamens and pistils in the same flower mature at the same time.

"Fumaria officinalis, Potentilla reptans, Erica tetralix, Solanum dulcamara, and Linaria cymbalaria are synacmic plants."—Treas. of Bot. (ed. 1876), p. 345.

sŷn-ăc'-mŷ, s. [Gr. synakmazō=to blossom at the same time: syn=together, and akmazō=to be in full bloom.] [ACME.]

Bot.: Mr. Alfred Bennett's name for Homogamy (q. v.). Called by Hildebrand Nondichogamy.

sŷn-ăer'-ê-sîs (ăer as êr), sŷn-êr'-ê-sîs*, subst. [Lat. synœresis, from Gr. synœresis=a taking together: syn=with, together, and hairesis=a taking; haireō=to take.]

Gram.: The contraction of two syllables or vowels into one by the suppression of one of the syllables or the formation of a diphthong; as, ne'er for never.

sŷn-a-gŏg'-ăl*, a. [English synagog(ue); -al.] Synagogical.

sŷn-a-gŏg'-îc-ăl, adj. [Mid. Eng. synagog(e)=a synagogue (q. v.); Eng. adj. suff. -ical.] Pertaining or relating to a synagogue.

sŷn'-a-gŏgue, sin-a-gogue*, syn-a-gog*, syn-a-goge*, s. [Fr. synagogue, from Lat. synagoga; Gr. synagōgē=a bringing together: syn=together, and agōgē=a bringing; agō=to lead.]

1. Literally and Judaism:

(1) A congregation or assembly of Jews for the purpose of worship or the performance of religious rites.

(2) A building set apart for Jewish as a church or chapel is for Christian worship. Under the Mosaic law worship of the highest type could take place only at one chosen spot (Deut. xii. 5, 21; xvi. 6), that divinely chosen early in the monarchy being Jerusalem (2 Chron. vi. 5, 6), though gatherings took place in various other localities (2 Kings, iv. 23). Meetings at stated times for worship do not seem to have arisen till the time of the Exile, when the services of the Temple were performed in abeyance. They constituted the germ of the subsequent synagogues, which are believed to have begun among the Jews resident out of Palestine. In Psalm lxxiv. 8, the persecutors are represented as burning up all the synagogues of God in the land. Jesus taught or preached and wrought miracles in the synagogues of Capernaum (Matt. xii. 9, Mark i. 21, Luke vii. 5, John vi. 59), in that of Nazareth (Matt. xiii. 54, Mark vi. 2, Luke iv. 16), and elsewhere (Luke iv. 15). Many Jewish synagogues are said to have existed in Jerusalem, besides one or more for foreigners (Acts vi. 9). Out of Palestine the Apostles found synagogues in Damascus (Acts ix. 2, 20), Antioch in Pisidia (xiii. 14), Iconium (xiv. 1), Thessalonica (xvii. 1), Berea (xviii. 19), Athens (xviii. 19), Corinth (xviii. 1, 4, 8), Ephesus (xviii. 19, xix. 8), and doubtless also in other places. Synagogues were usually built on elevated sites, suggested by Prov. i. 21 and Ezra ix. 9, often outside cities and towns, by the side of a river or small stream (cf. Acts, xvi. 13). The edifice was shaped like a theater, with the door on the west side, entering which one was conventionally supposed to look eastward to Jerusalem, even though that city might be to the west of the place. This was suggested by 1 Kings viii. 29, Dan. vi. 10, &c. The wooden chest or ark containing the scrolls of the law and vestments was on the eastern side, with a canopy above, or in a recess or sanctuary. In front of it were the desk of the reader or preacher and a platform, with arm-chairs for the elders, who faced the ordinary worshippers. The men sat on one side of the synagogue and the women on the other; they were moreover separated by a partition about six feet high. A light was kept perpetually burning. The governing body was the elders (Acts xiii. 15), presided over by a ruler of the synagogue (Mark v. 22, Luke xiii. 14), with two judicial colleagues, three almoners or deacons, a leader of the worship (Luke iv. 20), a servant like a caretaker, and ten men of leisure pledged to attend and constitute a congregation if no others came. The Law and the Prophets were read, with liturgical prayers, chanting of the psalms, and recitals of the ten commandments, the whole concluding with a benediction. The synagogues were used not only as places of worship, but as law courts, taking cognizance of petty offenses, the decisions of which were carried out within the sacred edifice (Matt. x. 17, Mark xiii. 9, Luke xii. 11, xxi. 12, Acts xxii. 19). Essentially the same arrangements obtain in the modern synagogue.

*2. Figuratively:

(1) A Christian church (James ii. 2). When the Christian and Jewish churches became quite separated, the use of the word in this sense ceased.

*2) Any assembly or meeting of men.

¶ The Great Synagogue: A "synagogue," or ruling religious assembly constituted probably by Nehemiah (not, as some have thought, by Ezra) about 410 B. C., continuing about 116 years, and developing about 300 B. C., into the Sanhedrim (q. v.). It sought to keep the people from intermarriage with the heathen, to compel them to observe the Sabbath and the Sabbatical year, and to make proper contribution for divine worship, besides seeing that the text of Scripture was kept pure. It is generally stated that there were 120 members. The Great Synagogue is never mentioned in the Old Testament, in the Apocrypha, or in Josephus or Philo, which has led Michaelis and other writers to doubt if it ever existed.

sŷn-a-gŏg'-uîsh*, a. [Eng. synagog(ue); -ish.] Pertaining or belonging to synagogues; fanatical.

sŷn'-a-grîs, s. [Gr. synagris=a kind of sea-fish mentioned by Aristotle.]

Ichthy.: A genus of Percidæ, with about twenty species from the Indo-Pacific. Marine fishes of small size; body sub-elongate, covered with ciliary scales of moderate size; mouth-cleft horizontal; one continuous dorsal with feeble spines, caudal deeply forked; teeth villiform, with canines, at least, in upper jaw; branchiostegals six.

sŷn-a-lê'-phă, sŷn-a-lê'-phă, s. [Lat. synalœpha, from Gr. synalœphē=a melting together: syn=together, and alœphō=to anoint with oil, to daub; alœphē=fat.]

Gram.: A contraction of syllables by the suppression of some vowel or diphthong at the end of a word before another vowel or diphthong; as, th' enemy for the enemy.

sŷn-ăl-lăg-măt'-îc, sŷn-ăl-lăg-măt'-îc-ăl, a. [Gr. synallagmatikos, from synallagma=a mutual agreement, a contract, from synallassō=to exchange, to negotiate with: syn=together, and allassō=to change.]

Civil Law: An epithet applied to a contract or treaty imposing reciprocal obligations.

sŷn-ăl-lăx'-î-nă, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. synallax(is); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -inæ.]

Ornith.: A sub-family of Dendrocolaptidæ, with twelve genera, ranging from Patagonia to Mexico. The outer toe is long, and is joined to the middle toe nearly as far as the first joint; the hinder toe is long and powerful, and all the claws are sharply curved, pointed, and strong; tail long, and always pointed. Although these birds are small, they build nests as large as those of the hawk or the crow; in the majority of cases these consist of a bundle of sticks loosely thrown together, in the middle of which the nest proper is made, consisting of two recesses, and in the inner one the eggs are laid on a bed of soft feathers. [See extract under SYNALLAXINE.]

sŷn-ăl-lăx'-î-nă, adj. [Mod. Lat. synallax(is); Eng. adj. suff. -inæ.] Of or belonging to the Synallaxinæ; having the outer and middle toes partially united.

"The Synallaxine birds are generally found upon the trees, which they traverse with great rapidity in search of the various insects on which they feed, and may often be seen running about upon the ground, peering anxiously into every little hole and cranny and dragging slugs, snails, worms, and beetles from the recesses in which they are accustomed to conceal themselves during the hours of daylight."—Wood: Illus. Nat. Hist., ii. 260.

sŷn-ăl-lăx'-îs, s. [Greek synallaxis=commerce, exchange.]

Ornith.: The type genus of Synallaxinæ (q. v.), with fifty-five species. They are divided into two groups—(1) with ten and (2) with twelve rectrices.

sŷn-ăn'-cêi-ă, s. [Greek synangkeia=a narrow valley in which streams meet. Named from their habitat.]

Ichthy.: A genus of Scorpenidæ; the general appearance of the species, especially of the head, monstrous; scaleless, soft warty protuberances or filaments on skin; mouth directed upward, wide, villiform teeth in jaws, sometimes on vomer; eyes small; from thirteen to sixteen dorsal spines; pectorals very large. There are four species from the Indo-Pacific, attaining a length of eighteen inches at most. They are greatly dreaded on account of the wounds they can inflict with their dorsal spines, each of which, in its terminal half, is provided with a deep groove on each side, at the lower end of which is a pear-shaped bag containing the venom, and prolonged into a membranous duct, and open at the point of the spine. Persons wading with naked feet in the sea often step on these fish, which lie hidden in the sand, when the spines enter the skin, and the poison is forced into the wound by the pressure of the foot on the poison-bag. Many cases are on record in which such wounds have been fatal.

sŷn-ăn-ċîd'-î-ŭm, s. [Mod. Lat. synanc(eia), and Gr. eidos=form.]

Ichthy.: A genus of Scorpenidæ, allied to Synanceia (q. v.); from tropical seas.

sŷn-ăn'-thêr-ă, s. pl. [Mod. Lat., from pref. syn-, and anthêros=blooming.] [ANTHER.]

Bot.: The Compositæ (q. v.).

sŷn-ăn'-thêr-ôl'-ô-gîst, subst. [English synantherolog(y); -ist.] One who studies or discourses on synantherous flowers.

"Facile princeps among synantherologists."—Journal of Botany, vol. x., No. 221, p. 150.

sŷn-ăn'-thêr-ôl'-ô-gŷ, s. [Mod. Lat. synantherœ, and Gr. logos=a word, a discourse.] A treatise on or a description of synantherous flowers.

sŷn-ăn'-thêr-ôus, a. [SYNANTHERÆ.]

Bot.: Having the anthers growing together; syn-genesious.

sŷn-ăn'-thoŭs, a. [Pref. syn-, and Gr. anthos=a flower, bloom.]

Bot. (of a plant): The term used when flower and leaves appear at the same time.

sŷn-ăn'-thrôse, subst. [Mod. Lat. synantherœ (q. v.); suff. -ose.]

Chem.: $C_{12}H_{22}O_{11}$. A variety of sugar found in the tubercles of the Jerusalem artichoke, dahlia, &c. It is amorphous, deliquescent, soluble in water and alcohol, the solution being faintly sweet, and turns brown when heated to 140°, yielding caramel.

sŷn-ăn'-thŷ, s. [SYNANTHOUS.]

Bot.: The adhesion of several flowers.

sŷn-ăph-ô-brăn'-chŭs, subst. [Gr. synapheia=combination, connection, and branchia=gills.]

Ichthy.: A genus of Muraenidæ, with four species. They are deep-sea congers, universally distributed, occurring at depths of from about 400 to 2,000 fathoms. Gill-openings ventral; pectorals and vertical well developed; nostrils lateral, mouth-cleft wide, teeth small, body scaly; stomach extremely distensible.

sŷn-ăp'-tă, s. [Gr. synaptos=fastened together, continuous.]

Zoöl. & Palæont.: A genus of Holothuroidæ, belonging to the order Apoda, or to the family Synaptidæ (q. v.). The body is vermiform or slug-shaped, and the calcareous matter secreted by the integument is reduced to scattered spicules. Calcareous spiculæ from the Coal-measures, and from Secondary and Tertiary deposits have been referred to this genus.

sŷn-ăp'-tăse, s. [SYNAPTA.] [EMULSIN.]

sŷn-ăp'-tîc'-u-lă, s. pl. [Mod. Lat., from Gr. synaptos=fastened together.]

Zoöl.: Transverse calcareous bars which stretch across the interseptal loculi in the Fungidæ, and form a kind of trellis-work, uniting the opposite faces of adjacent septa.

tsŷn-ăp'-tî-dă, s. pl. [Mod. Latin synapt(a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Zoöl.: A family of the Holothuridan sub-order Apneumona. No respiratory tree; ambulacral tube-feet wanting. [SYNAPTA.]

sŷn-ăp'-tŭr'-ă, s. [Gr. synaptos=continuous, and oura=a tail.]

Ichthy.: A genus of Pleuronectidæ (q. v.), with eighteen species from the Indian Ocean, and two from the Mediterranean and the coast of Portugal. Eyes on the right side, the upper in advance of the lower; mouth-cleft narrow; vertical fins confluent; lateral line straight.

sŷn-ar-chŷ*, subst. [Gr. synarchia, from syn=together, and arche=rule.] Joint rule, joint sovereignty.

"The synarchies or joint reigns of father and son have rendered the chronology a little difficult."—Stackhouse: Hist. of the Bible.

sŷn-ar-tê'-sîs*, subst. [Gr., from syn=together, and artaō=to fasten.] A fastening or knitting together; the state of being closely united; close or intimate union.

sŷn-ar-thrô'-dî-ăl, a. [SYNARTHROSIS.] Of, or pertaining to, or in the nature of synarthrosis.

sŷn-ar-thrô'-sîs, s. [Gr., from syn=together, and arthrô=to articulate; arthron=a joint.]

Anat.: The union of bones without motion; close union, as in sutures, symphysis, and the like.

"There is a conspicuous motion where the conjunction is called diarthrosis, as in the elbow; an obscure one, where the conjunction is called synarthrosis, as in the joining of the carpus to the metacarpus."—Wiseman: Surgery.

sŭn-ăst'-rŭ, s. [Gr. syn=together, and astēr=a star.] Coincidence as regards stellar influence; the state of having similar starry influences presiding over one's fortune, as determined by astrological calculation.

sŭn-ăx'-is, s. [Gr., from synagō=to bring together.] [SYNAGOGUE.] A congregation; also a term formerly used for the Lord's Supper.

"To eat and celebrate synaxes and church meetings."—Bp. Taylor: Holy Dying, pt. ii., ch. v.

sŭn'-carp, s. [SYNCARPI.]

Bot.: Any member of the Syncarpi (q. v.).

sŭn-car'-pī, s. pl. [Mod. Lat., from prefix syn-, and Gr. karpōs=fruit.]

Bot.: Compound fruits, i. e., with the ovaries and the fruit compound. Examples, the Samara, Silqua, Glans, Pomum, &c.

sŭn-car'-pī-ŭm, s. [SYNCARPI.]

Bot.: An aggregate fruit, with the pericarps adherent into a solid mass. Examples, the fruits of Anona and Magnolia.

sŭn-car'-poŭs, a. [Eng. syncarp; -ous.]

Bot. (of an ovary or a fruit): Having the carpels closely coherent.

sŭn-car-pŷ, s. [Eng. syncarp; -y.]

Bot.: The adhesion of several fruits.

sŭn-căt-ě-gŏr-ě-măt'-ic, a. & s. [Gr. syn=together, and katēgorēma=a predicate.]

A. As adjective:

Logic: Applied to words which cannot singly express a term, but only a part of a term, as adverbs, prepositions, &c.

"A word which can, by itself, form a term is called categorematic. A word which cannot, by itself, form a term, but can, by itself, form a part of one, is called syncategorematic—i. e., union or conjunction with other words. A word which, by itself, can form a term and something more (a predicate, for instance, and a copula) may be hypercategorematic = over and implying excess."—Latham: Logic as Applied to Language, § 107.

B. As subst.: A word which cannot be used as a term by itself, as an adverb, a preposition, &c.

sŭn-chŏn-drŏ-sis, s. [Gr., from syn=together, and chondros=a cartilage.]

Anat.: The connection of bones by means of cartilage or gristle, as in the vertebrae. It is well exemplified in the sacro-ilia articulation, or synchondrosis, formed through the union of the auricular surfaces of the sacrum and the ilium by a plate of cartilage between them.

sŭn-chŏn-drŏt'-ŏ-mŷ, s. [Gr. syngchondrōsis=synchondrosis (q. v.), and tomē=a cutting.]

Surg.: The same as SYMPHYSEOTOMY (q. v.).

sŭn-chŏ-rē-sis, subst. [Gr. =concession, from synchōreō=to come together, to meet.]

Rhet.: A concession made for the purpose of reporting more pointedly.

sŭn'-chrŏn-ā, a. & s. [Gr. syngchronos = contemporaneous: syn=together, and chronos = time.]

A. As adj.: Happening at the same time; simultaneous, contemporaneous.

"That glorious estate of the church, which is synchrŏnal to the second and third thunder."—Dr. H. More: On the Seven Churches, p. 141.

B. As subst.: That which happens at the same time with something else, or pertains to the same time.

"The near cognation and colligation of those seven synchrŏnals that are contemporary to the six first trumpets."—Dr. H. More: Mystery of Godliness, p. 182.

sŭn'-chrŏn'-ic-ā, a. [SYNCHRONAL.] Happening at the same time; simultaneous, synchronous.

"The systole and diastole of the heart and lungs being far from synchrŏnical."—Boyle: Works, i. 103.

sŭn'-chrŏn'-ic-ā-lŷ, adv. [Eng. synchronical; -ly.] In a synchronical manner; at the same time; simultaneously.

"Muscular motions . . . excite each other either synchronically or successively, according to the order of impressions."—Belsham: Philos. of the Mind, ch. iii., § 2.

sŭn'-chrŏn-iŝm, s. [Gr. syngchronismos, from syngchronos=synchronal (q. v.); Fr. synchronisme.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Concurrence of two or more events in time; simultaneousness.

"The coherence and synchronism of all parts of the Mosaic chronology."—Hale: Orig. of Mankind.

2. A tabular arrangement of historical events and personages, grouped together according to their dates.

II. Paint.: A representation of two or more events at the same time, or of the same event at different stages of its progress.

sŭn'-chrŏn-ist'-ic, sŭn'-chrŏn-ist'-ic-ā, adj. [SYNCHRONISM.]

1. Pertaining to synchronism; as, synchronistic tables.

2. Happening at the same time; synchronous, simultaneous.

"The exact definition of three synchronistic events."—Cooper: Monumental Hist. Egypt, p. 16.

sŭn'-chrŏn-ist'-ic-ā-lŷ, adv. [Eng. synchronistical; -ly.] In a synchronistic manner; according to dates.

"A chronological chart, synchronistically and ethnographically arranged."—Athenæum, Sept. 9, 1882. (Adv.)

sŭn'-chrŏn-i-zā'-tion, s. [Eng. synchroniz(e); -ation.]

1. The act of synchronizing.

2. The happening of events at the same time.

sŭn'-chrŏn-ize, v. i. & t. [SYNCHRONISM.]

A. Intrans.: To concur in point of time; to happen at the same time.

"All these synchronize with the six first trumpets."—More: Myst. of Godliness, p. 191.

B. Trans.: To make to agree in time; to cause to indicate the same time as another; to regulate or control as a clock, by a standard timepiece, as the chief clock in an observatory.

sŭn'-chrŏn-iz-ēr, s. [Eng. synchroniz(e); -er.] One who or that which synchronizes; a contrivance for synchronizing clocks.

sŭn'-chrŏn-ŏl'-ŏ-gŷ, s. [Gr. syngchronos=synchronous, and logos=a word, a discourse.] Chronological arrangement side by side.

sŭn'-chrŏn-oŭs, a. [SYNCHRONAL.] Happening at the same time; simultaneous.

"The corresponding associations are either synchronous or successive."—Belsham: Philos. of the Mind, ch. iii., § 2.

sŭn'-chrŏn-oŭs-lŷ, adv. [Eng. synchronous; -ly.] In a synchronous manner; at the same time; simultaneously.

tsŭn'-chrŏn-ŷ, s. [SYNCHRONAL.] Contemporaneity in time; synchronism.

sŭn'-chŷ-sis, s. [Gr. syngchysis, from syn=together, and chysis=a pouring; cheō=to pour.]

I. Ord. Lang.: Confusion, derangement.

II. Technically:

1. Pathology:

(1) The confusion of the humors of the eye generally produced by a violent blow, or from an inflammation of the uvea, producing a rupture of the vessels and an escape of the humors.

(2) The opaqueness or corrosion of the cornea with an apparent confusion of the humors of the eye—the effect of violent ophthalmia.

2. Rhet.: A confused arrangement of words in a sentence which obscures the sense.

sŭn'-cŭ-pŭt, s. [SINCIPUT.]

sŭn-clā'-dē-i, s. pl. [Pref. syn-, and Gr. klados=a branch.]

Botany: A section of mosses with fasciculate branches, the female flower occupying the place of a branch, or united in the axes of two or more branches. Antheridia at the tips of short reflexed ramuli, inserted singly among the leaves. Only one natural order, Sphagnei (q. v.).

sŭn-clīn'-ā, a. & s. [Gr. syngklinō=to incline together: syn=together, and klinō=to bend, to incline.]

A. As adjective:

Geol. (of strata): Sloping downward in opposite directions, so as to meet in a common point or line.

B. As subst.: A synclinal line or axis.

synclinal-axis, s. [SYNCLINAL-LINE.]

synclinal-dip, s.

Geol.: The complex dip produced by the inclination of the beds on the two sides of a synclinal axis. (Seeley.)

Geol.: An imaginary line toward which, on both sides, strata slope, so as to meet and form a basin.

synclinal-valley, s.

Geol.: A valley formed by a synclinal axis between two ridges of folded strata. Such valleys exist in the Alps, &c. (Seeley.)

sŭn-clīn'-ic-ā, a. [SYNCLINAL.]

sŭn'-cŏ-pā, a. [Eng. syncop(e); -al.] Pertaining to, resembling, or of the nature of syncope.

sŭn'-cŏ-pāte, v. t. [Lat. syncopatus, pa. par. of syncopō=to swoon; syncopē, syncopa=a swoon, syncope (in gram.); Gr. syngkopē=a cutting short, syncope (in gram.), a swoon: syn=with, together, and koptō=to cut.]

1. Gram.: To contract, as a word, by omitting one or more letters or syllables from the middle, as Glo'ster for Gloucester.

2. Music: To commence, as a tone or note, on an unaccented part of a bar, and continue it into the following accented part. [SYNCOPE, 2.]

sŭn'-cŏ-pā'-tion, s. [SYNCOPE.]

1. Gram.: The contraction of a word by the omission of one or more letters or syllables from the middle.

"The time has long past for such syncopations and compressions as gave us 'arbalist,' 'governor,' 'pedant,' and 'proctor,' from 'arcubalista,' 'gubernator,' 'pædagogans,' and 'procurator.'"—Fitzedward Hall: Modern English, p. 175.

2. Music: Suspension or alteration of rhythm by driving the accent to that part of a bar not usually accented. Syncopation may be completed in a bar, or it may be carried by sequence through several bars, or it may be so that more than one bar is involved in the syncopation. Syncopated counterpoint is the fourth species of counterpoint.

sŭn'-cŏ-pě, sŭn'-cŏp, s. [Lat., from Gr. syngkopē.] [SYNCOPE.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. In the same sense as II. 2.

*2. A sudden pause or cessation; a suspension; temporary stop or inability to go on.

"Revelry and dance, and show, Suffer a syncopē and solemn pause," Cowper: Task, ii. 80.

II. Technically:

1. Gram.: The contraction of a word by elision; an elision or omission of one or more letters, or a syllable, from the middle of a word, as in ne'er for never, ev'ry for every.

2. Pathol.: [FAINTING, C. 2.]

3. Music: The same as SYNCOPATION (q. v.).

sŭn'-cŏ-pist, s. [Eng. syncop(e); -ist.] One who syncopates or contracts words by syncopé.

"To outshine all the modern syncopists, and thoroughly content my English readers."—Addison: Spectator, No. 567.

sŭn'-cŏ-pize, v. t. [Eng. syncop(e); -ize.] To contract by syncopation; to syncopate.

"A poetical humor of syncopizing and contracting their words."—Dalgarno: Deaf and Dumb Man's Tutor.

sŭn'-crā-tŝm, s. [SYNCRETISM.]

sŭn'-crē-tic, a. & s. [SYNCRETISM.]

A. As adj.: Of or pertaining to syncretism; characterized by syncretism.

B. As subst.: A syncretist (q. v.).

sŭn'-crē-tŝm, s. [Low Lat. syncretismus, from Ger. synkretismus, from Gr. syngkrētismos, a word occurring only in Plutarch (vii. 910, ed. Reiske), and defined there as coined by the Cretans to denote their custom of uniting against a common foe, though they continually quarreled among themselves. The verb syngkrētizō was used in an analogous sense by Erasmus (Corp. Ref., i. 77) in writing to Melancthon on April 22, 1519. (Herzog.)]

Church Hist.: A word introduced from the writings of the German Reformers, who, however much they varied among themselves, were unanimous on at least one subject—opposition to the Roman Church. The word passed through three distinct phases of meaning:

(1) A union between the Lutheran and Reformed Churches on the basis of common tenets.

(2) A union between Roman Catholics and Protestants on the basis of fundamental articles of belief.

(3) The principle of moderation, expansion, and development in Lutheran theology, as opposed to a rigid orthodoxy.

Blunt (Dict. Doct. & Hist. Theol., p. 725) says that "the term may be held to apply to any well-meaning but weak attempt to combine in one system opposite and contradictory theological opinions." [SYNCRETISTIC-CONTROVERSY.]

"True, it is now rid of one of the most objectionable features of the original foundation, that syncretism with Lutheranism which was the chaining of a living body to a corpse."—Church Times, Feb. 25, 1887.

sŭn'-crē-tist, s. [SYNCRETISM.]

Church Hist.: An advocate of any kind of Syncretism (q. v.); specif. applied to the followers and supporters of Calixtus. [SYNCRETISTIC-CONTROVERSY.]

"He was violently attacked by the two opposite parties, the Romanist calling him Calvinistic, the Lutheran reviling him as a Papist, and both parties agreed in corrupting the term syncretist into 'Sünde-Christ,' 'Sin-Christian.'"—Blunt. Dict. Doct. and Hist. Theol., p. 725.

sŭn'-crē-tist'-ic, a. [Eng. syncretist; -ic.] Of or pertaining to Syncretism or the Syncretists.

Church Hist.: The name given to a series of controversies which arose in the Lutheran Church in the seventeenth century, from the subject of the bŏl, bŏy; pŏut, jŏwī; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, thŭis; sin, aŝ; expect, Xenophon, exŭst. ph = f. -cian, -tian = shān. -tion, -sion = shŭn; tion, -sion = zhŭn. -tious, -cious, -sious = shŭs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bēl, dēl.

discussion—the promotion of fellowship and union between the protestant churches of Germany. These controversies may be grouped into three periods:

1. From the Colloquy of Thorn (1645), in which it was sought to force a new confession of faith on the Lutheran Church, to the death of Calixtus (1656). George Calixtus was a professor of theology at Helmstadt, and his scheme of union was founded on the following propositions: (1) That the fundamental principles of Christianity were maintained pure in the Roman, Lutheran and Reformed Churches. (2) That the tenets and opinions which had been constantly received by the ancient doctors during the first five centuries were to be considered as of equal truth and authority with the express declarations and doctrines of scripture. (3) That the churches which received these points, and held the additional tenets of the particular churches as non-essential, should come into peaceful relations, and thus pave the way for a future union. After the death of Calixtus, there was a period of peace for about five years.

2. From 1661-69. The conflict was renewed by the wish of the Landgrave of Hesse-Cassel, William VI., to secure a religious constitution broad enough to embrace both the Lutheran and Reformed Churches. The second attempt to have the Consensus adopted, which implicitly condemned Calixtus and his adherents as non-Lutheran and heretical, was a failure, and the subject was abandoned for a time.

3. In 1675, Calovius, professor of divinity at Wittenberg, reopened the controversy, and compelled the University of Jena to disavow all sympathy with the views of Calixtus. The death of Calovius in 1686 put an end to the dispute.

sŷn'-crĭ-sis, s. [Gr.=a comparison, from syn=together, and krisis=a judging; krinō=to judge.] Rhet.: A figure by which opposite persons or things are compared.

sŷnd, v. t. [Etym. doubtful.] To rinse. (Scotch.) "Something now and then to synd my mouth wi'."—Scott: Bride of Lammermoor, ch. v.

sŷn-dăc'-tŷl, sŷn-dăc'-tŷle, a. & s. [SYNDACTYL.]

A. As adj.: (See extract.)

"The name of Syndactyle has been given by writers to all such feet as have the outer toe more or less joined to the middle; hence, as such feet occur in almost every natural group among the Perchers, the term has become altogether vague from its indiscriminate use."—Swainson: Birds, i. 148.

B. As subst.: An individual member of the Syndactyli (q. v.).

sŷn-dăc'-tŷl-i, s. pl. [Pref. syn-, and Gr. daktylos=a finger.] Ornithology.

1. A division of Birds, in which the middle toe is united to the last as far as the second joint, as in the kingfishers. (G. Cuvier.) Used in a nearly similar sense by Illiger.

2. A family of Sea-birds, with the genera: Phalarocorax, Pelecanus, Plotus, Phaethon, and Sula. (Vieillot.) sŷn-dăc'-tŷl'-ic, sŷn-dăc'-tŷl-oŷs, a. [SYNDACTYL.] Pertaining to or having the characteristics of the Syndactyli (q. v.).

sŷn-dăc'-tŷl-ŷs, s. [SYNDACTYL.]

Zoöl.: Holobates syndactylus, the Simia syndactyla of Raffles, sometimes elevated to generic rank. [SIAMANG.]

sŷn'-dăw, sŷn'-dôw, substantive. [Ger. sindau.] [SUNDEW.]

Bot.: Alchemilla vulgaris.

sŷn-dên'-drĭ-ŷm, s. [Pref. syn-, and Gr. den-dron=a tree.]

Biol.: The complex tree-like mass dependent from the umbrella of the Rhizostomidæ.

sŷn-dēs-môg'-ra-phŷ, s. [Greek syndesmos=a ligament, and graphō=to write.]

Anat.: A description of or treatise on the ligaments of the body.

sŷn-dēs-môl'-ô-gŷ, s. [Gr. syndesmos=a ligament, and logos=a word, a discourse.]

Anat.: A treatise on, or scientific facts regarding the ligaments which connect the parts of the skeleton.

sŷn-dēs-mô'-sis, s. [Gr. syndesmos=a ligament.] Anat.: A species of symphysis or mediate connection of bones, in which they are united by ligament, as the radius with the ulna.

sŷn-dēs-môt'-ô-mŷ, s. [Gr. syndesmos=a ligament, and tomē=a cutting.]

Anatomy: The dissection of the ligaments of the body.

sŷn'-dĭc, sin'-dĭck, sŷn'-dĭck, s. [Fr. syndic, from Lat. syndikus, Gr. syndikos=helping in a court of justice; a syndicate; syn=together, and dikē=justice.] An officer of Government invested with varying powers in different places; a kind of magistrate intrusted with the management of the affairs of a city or community; also one chosen to transact business for others. In the University of Cambridge, England, syndics are chosen from the senate to transact special business, as the regulation of fees, the operations of the Clarendon Press, &c.

"May it please you, that Dr. Gunning and Dr. Pearson may be your legal syndics, for you and in your name, to treat and conclude with the said Archbishop concerning his and your right and interest in the said books."—Grace in the Senate, Cambridge, July, 1662.

sŷn'-dĭ-căte, s. [Eng. syndic; -ate.]

*1. A body of syndics; a council; the office, position, or state of a syndic.

2. An association of persons formed for the purpose of promoting some particular enterprise, undertaking, or speculation, or of discharging some trust.

sŷn'-dĭ-căte, v. t. [SYNDICATE, s.] To judge, to censure.

"Aristotle, Platoes schollar . . . vndertooke to censure and syndicate both his master, and all other law-makers."—Hakewill: Apologie, bk. iv., § 4.

sŷn'-drô-mē, subst. [Gr. syndromē=a running together: syn=together, and dromos=a course.]

1. Ord. Lang.: Concurrent action; concurrence.

"Every single motion owing a dependence on such a syndrome of præ-required virtues."—Glanvill: Vanity of Dogmatizing, ch. xxii.

2. Pathol.: A word introduced by the empirical school of medicine to express a concurrence of symptoms. When, for instance, a disease arose from plethora, its symptoms, collectively, were called a Plethoric syndrome.

sŷne, adv. [SINCE.] (Scotch.)

¶ Soon or syne: Sooner or later.

sŷn-ēc'-dô-chē, sin-ēc'-dô-chē, sŷn-ēc'-dôch, s. [Lat. synecdoche, from Gr. synekdochē=a receiving together: syn=together, and ekdechomai=to receive; Fr. synecdoche.]

Rhet.: A figure of speech by which the whole of a thing is taken for the part, or a part for the whole, as the genus for the species, or the species for the genus.

"And the same philologer further adds, the gods or stars, do by a synecdoche signifie all things, or the whole world."—Cudworth: Intell. System, p. 358.

sŷn-ēc'-dôch'-ic-al, adj. [Eng. synecdoch(e); -ical.] Of the nature of a synecdoche; expressed by or implying a synecdoche.

"Isis is used for Thamesis, by a synecdochical kind of speech, or by a poetical liberty."—Drayton: Mrs. Shore to Edward IV. (Note 2.)

sŷn-ēc'-dôch'-ic-al-lŷ, adv. [Eng. synecdochical; -ly.] According to the synecdochical mode of speaking; by means of a synecdoche.

"The decalogue . . . is indeed peculiarly called the covenant between God and that people! viz., synecdochically."—Barrow: Sermons, vol. ii., ser. 15.

sŷn-ē-chĭ'-a, s. [Mod. Lat., from Gr. synecheia, from synēchō=to hold together: syn=together, and echō=to have, to hold; Fr. synéchie.]

Ophthal.: The adhesion of the iris to the cornea or to the capsule of the crystalline lens.

sŷn-ēc-phô-nē'-sis, s. [Gr. from synekphōnēō=to utter together; syn=together, and ekphōnēō=to cry out; ek=out, and phōnēō=to sound, to call; phōnē=sound.]

Gram.: A contraction of two syllables into one; synæresis.

Sŷn-ē-drĭ-anŷ, s. pl. [SYNEDROUS.]

Church Hist.: A name given by the Novations to orthodox Christians, because they received apostates and those who sacrificed to idols back into communion on their giving proof of repentance.

sŷn-ē'-droŷs, a. [Gr. synedros=sitting together: syn=together, and hedra=a seat.]

Bot. (Of a petiole): Growing upon the angles of a stem instead of between them.

sŷn-ē'-ma, s. [Greek synēmōn=joined together; syniēmī=to send together: syn=together, and hiēmī=to send.]

Bot.: That part of the column of an orchid which represents the filament of the stamens.

sŷn-ē'-pŷ, s. [Greek synepeia=union of sounds: syn=together, and epos=a word.]

Rhet.: The interjunction of words in uttering the clauses of sentences.

sŷn-ēr'-ē-sis, s. [SYNÆRESIS.]

sŷn-ēr-gēt'-ic, a. [Gr. synergētikos.] [SYNERGIST.] Working together; coöperating.

sŷn-ēr'-gĭsm, s. [SYNERGIST.]

Church Hist.: A type of Semipelagianism which came into prominence in Germany in the sixteenth century, and which had for its chief representatives Erasmus and Melancthon. Luther taught that the Fall rendered Man incapable of all good, and powerless to contribute anything to his conversion. Synergism, on the other hand, taught that "God does not deal with man as with a block, but draws him so that his will coöperates;" and this view was adopted in the Leipzig Interim (1548). A controversy arose on the subject, caused by the publication of a book in 1558 on the Liberty of the Will, by Pfeffinger, a professor at Leipzig, which University, together with Wittenberg, represented the Synergist view. Flacius, professor of theology at Jena, took the strictly Lutheran view, which was adopted in the Formula of Concord. [FORMULA, ¶ (2).]

"Flacius therefore so successfully accused him of Synergism before the court of Weimar, that Strigel was put into close custody by order of the prince."—Mosheim: Eccles. Hist. (ed. Reid), p. 651.

sŷn-ēr'-gĭst, s. & a. [Fr. synergiste, from Greek synergō=to work together: syn=together, and ergon=work.]

A. As subst.: A supporter of Synergism (q. v.); a Semipelagian.

"The strenuous Lutherans . . . violently assaulted the persons whom they denominated Synergists."—Mosheim: Eccles. Hist. (ed. Reid), p. 650.

B. As adj.: Synergistic (q. v.).

"The problem took a new form in the Synergist controversy, which discussed the nature of the first impulse in conversion."—Encyc. Brit. (ed. 9th), xv. 85.

sŷn-ēr'-gĭst'-ic, sŷn-ēr'-gĭst'-ic-al, a. [Eng. synergist; -ic, -ical.]

1. Working together; coöperating.

2. Of or relating to the Synergists or their doctrine.

synergistic-controversy, s. [SYNERGISM.]

sŷn-ēr'-gŷs, s. [Gr. synergos=working together with.] [SYNERGIST.]

Entom.: A genus of Cynipidæ. Synergus vulgaris has the mouth, antennæ, and legs red. It breeds in cuckoo fashion, in the galls produced by Cynips quercus folii, ultimately devouring its larvæ.

sŷn-ēr'-gŷ, s. [SYNERGIST.] A correlation or concurrence of action between different organs in health, and, according to some, in disease.

sŷn-ē-thēr-ēs, subst. [Gr. synēthēs=dwelling together.]

Zoöl.: The type-genus of Synetherina (q. v.), with eight or ten species from tropical America. They have only four toes on the hind feet, but in place of the hallux, there is a fleshy pad between which and the toes the animal can grasp objects with tenacity.

sŷn-ē-thēr-i-na, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. synether(es); Lat. neut. pl. adj. suff. -ina.]

Zoöl.: New-world Porcupines, Tree-porcupines; a group of Hystricidæ, with three genera, Erethizon, Synetheres, and Chætomys. They have rooted molars, complete collar-bones, tuberculate soles, and four mamma; the upper lip is uncleft, and there is no trace of a pollex. The spines are largely mixed with long, soft hair, and the tail is long and prehensile.

sŷn-gē-nē'-ŷĭ-a, s. [Mod. Lat., from pref. syn-, and Gr. genesis=birth, generation.]

Bot.: The nineteenth order in Linnæus' artificial classification. The anthers, and more rarely the filaments, are united into a cylinder or tube. It contained the Composites, &c., and was divided into the orders Polygamia Æqualia, Polygamia Superflua, Polygamia Frustranea, Polygamia Necessaria, Polygamia Segregata, and Monogamia.

sŷn-gēn'-ē'-ŷĭ-oŷs, sŷn-gēn'-ē'-ŷĭ-an, a. [SYNGENESIA.]

Bot.: Having the anthers united by their margins into a tube, as in the Composites, in the violet, the balsam, &c.; of or belonging to the class Syngenesia (q. v.).

sŷn-gēn'-ē'-sis, s. [SYNGENESIA.]

Biol.: (See extract.)

"The theory of Syngenesia, which considers the embryo to be the product of both male and female, is as old as Empedocles, though it had no better basis than the observed resemblance between the offspring and both parents. Modern research has furnished a scientific basis by showing that, while in the higher animals both ova and spermatozoa are equally indispensable, they are themselves only modifications of one and the same anatomical element."—Lewes: Aristotle, p. 353.

sŷn-gē-nēt'-ic, a. [SYNGENESIS.] Of or belonging to Syngenesia (q. v.).

"The Syngenic theory—which makes both parents equally progenitors."—Lewes: Aristotle, p. 351.

sŷn'-gēn-ĭte, s. [Gr. synggenēs=related; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A monoclinic mineral, occurring in small tabular crystals in rock salt at Kalusz, Galicia. Hardness, 2½; specific gravity, 2.603. Composition: A hydrated sulphate of potash and lime, the formula being, CaOSO₃.KOSO₃+H₂O.

fâte, fât, fâre, amidst, whât, fâll, father; wê, wêt, hêre, camêl, hêr, thêre; pine, plt, sĭre, sĭr, marine; gô, pôť, or. wôre wolf, wôrĭk, whô, sôn; mûte, cûb, cûre, unite, cûr, rûle. fûll; trŷ, Sŷrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = â. qu = kw.

sŷn-gnā-thī-dæ (g silent), s. pl. [Mod. Lat. syn-gnath(us); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

1. Ichthy.: Pipe-fishes; a family of Lophobranchii; gill-openings reduced to a very small opening near the upper posterior angle of the gill; one soft dorsal fin; ventrals, and sometimes one or more of the other fins, absent. They are small marine fishes, abundant on the coasts of the tropical and temperate zones where the marine vegetation is thick enough to offer them shelter. All the species enter brackish, and some fresh water. There are two groups; Hippocampina and Syngnathina (q. v.).
2. Palæont.: From the Eocene of Monte Bolca, and the Miocene of Licata, in Sicily.

sŷn-gnā-thī-na (g silent), s. pl. [Mod. Lat. syn-gnath(us); Lat. neut. pl. adj. suff. -ina.]

Ichthy.: A group of Syngnathidæ (q. v.), with several genera. The tail is not prehensile, and a caudal fin is generally present.

sŷn-gnā-thoūs (g silent), a. [SYNGNATHUS.] Of, belonging to, or characteristic of the Syngnathidæ.

"The males of existing syngnathous fishes receive the eggs of the females in their abdominal pouches."—Darwin: Descent of Man (ed. 2d), p. 163.

sŷn-gnā-thūs (g silent), s. [Gr. syn=together, and gnathos=the jaw. Named from the fact that the maxillaries are produced into a tubular snout.]

Ichthy.: Pipe-fish (q. v.); the type-genus of Syngnathidæ, with about fifty species; its distribution nearly coincides with that of the family. Body with the ridges more or less distinct; pectorals well-developed, caudal-fin present; dorsal opposite or near the seat; egg-pouch as in Siphonostoma (q. v.).

sŷn-graph, s. [Fr. syngraphe, from Lat. syn-grapha; Gr. synggraphē, from syn=with, together, and graphō=to write.] A writing signed by both or all the parties to a contract or bond.

"The syngraphs and original subscriptions of divers Eastern Patriarchs."—Evelyn: Diary, Oct. 29, 1662.

sŷn-i-zē-sīs, s. [Gr., from synizō=to sit with or together; syn=with, together, and hizō=to sit.]

1. Gram.: The contraction of two syllables, or two vowels, into one; synephephesis.

2. Pathol.: Blindness caused by an obstruction, or by a contraction of the pupil.

sŷn-neu-rō-sīs, subst. [Gr. syn=together, and neuron=a nerve, a sinew.]

Anat.: The connection of parts by means of ligaments, as in the movable joints.

sŷn-ō-cha, s. [Mod. Lat., from Gr. synochē=a holding together; synecho=to hold together.] [SYNECHIA.]

Pathol.: Relapsing fever (q. v.).

sŷn-ō-chal, a. [Eng. synoch(a); -al.]

Med.: Pertaining or relating to synocha.

sŷn-ō-chōr-i-ōn, subst. [Pref. syn-; o connect., and Gr. chorion=skin, leather.]

Bot.: Mirbel's name for a Carcerule (q. v.).

sŷn-ō-chūs, s. [SYNOCHA.]

Pathol.: A continued fever, combined of synocha and typhus, and in its commencement much resembling the latter. (Dunghlison.)

sŷn-ōc-rē-ate, sŷn-ōch-rē-ate, adj. [Pref. syn-, and Eng. ochreate (q. v.).]

Bot.: Having the stipules united into a sheath.

sŷn-ōd, subst. [Fr. synode, from Lat. synodum, accus. of synodus; Gr. synodos=a meeting; syn=with, together, and hodos=a way, hence a coming.]

I. Ordinary Language:

*1. A meeting or convention, as of a legislative assembly; a council.

"It hath in solemn synods been decreed, Both by the Syracusans and ourselves."
Shakesp.: Comedy of Errors, i. 1.

*2. A conjunction of two or more of the heavenly bodies.

"Their planetary motions and aspects . . .
Of noxious efficacy, and when to join
In synod unbenign."
Milton: P. L., x. 661.

II. Eccles.: A meeting or assembly of ecclesiastical persons for mutual deliberation on matters of difficulty or of general interest affecting the churches over which they rule, and designed for their guidance. In the early Church there were four kinds of synod. First, an Œcumenical, that is, a General or Universal Synod, commonly called a General Council [COUNCIL]; second, a National Synod, attended by the clergy of one nation only; third, a Provincial Synod, attended by the clergy of a province [Convocation (q. v.) is of this type]; and, fourth, a Diocesan Synod, attended by the clergy of a single diocese. Among the Presbyterians a synod is a "court" intermediate between the General Assembly and a Presbytery, or, if no Assembly exist, it is then itself the highest court. It is divided into Presbyteries, of which there are never less than three. Each congregation is represented by a minister and an elder.

Synod of Dort:

Church Hist.: A synod held at Dort, Dordt, or Dordrecht, in Southern Holland, in 1618 and 1619, to discuss the views of Arminius, which it condemned. [ARMINIAN.]

synod-man, s. A member of a Church synod.

"He has abus'd our church . . .

Despised our synod-men like dirt,
And made their discipline his sport."

Butler: Hudibras, pt. ii., ch. iii.

sŷn-ōd-al, sin-od-all, syn-od-all, a. & s. [Eng. synod; -al.]

A. As adj.: Of or pertaining to a synod or synods; done in or by a synod; synodic; of the nature of a synod.

"The synodall assemblies by the bishops or commissioners."—Holinshed: Hist. Scot. (an. 1583).

B. As substantive (pl.):

*1. A name sometimes given to constitutions made in provincial or diocesan synods.

2. Payments formerly made by the parochial clergy to the bishop in honor of the episcopal chair, and in token of subjection and obedience. These charges were transferred to the ecclesiastical commissioners, who claim them through the archdeacons when the latter go their rounds.

sŷn-ō-dī-an, s. [Eng. synod; -ian.] A synod-man.

sŷn-ōd-ic, sŷn-ōd-ic-al, syn-od-ic-all, adj. [Gr. synodikos, from synodos=a synod (q. v.); Fr. synodique.]

I. Ord. Lang.: Of or pertaining to a synod; transacted in a synod; made in or by a synod.

"It could not stand with their conscience to promise obedience to all synodical decrees."—Hales: Remains; Let. from the Synod of Dort, Jan., 1618.

II. Astron.: Of or pertaining to a conjunction between two heavenly bodies, or specially to the time intervening between them, extending from one conjunction to the next.

"The moon makes its synodical motion about the earth in 29 days, 12 hours, and about 44 minutes."—Locke: Natural Philosophy, ch. xiii.

Astron.: The period between two successive conjunctions of the sun and moon. It is 29 days, 12 hours, 44 minutes, 2'37 seconds. Called also Lunation and Lunar Month.

synodical-revolution, s.

Astron.: The period which elapses between two successive conjunctions of a planet with the sun.

sŷn-ōd-ic-al-lŷ, adv. [Eng. synodical; -ly.]

1. By the authority of a synod or public assembly.

"Which sentence passed by the major part of voices, and was synodically concluded."—Hales: Remains; Let. from the Synod of Dort, Dec., 1618.

2. In a synod.

"Dionysius, Bishop of Rome, in a letter (wrote very probably with the advice and consent of his clergy synodically convened)."—Waterland: Works, ii., ser. 8.

sŷn-ō-dīst, s. [English synod; -ist.] One who adheres to a synod.

sŷn-ō-dōn-tīs, s. [Pref. syn-, and Greek odous, odontos=a tooth.]

Ichthy.: A genus of Siluridæ Stenobranchiæ, group Doradina, with fifteen species, characteristic of tropical Africa. Adipose fin moderate or long, dorsal with very strong spine, and seven soft rays; teeth in lower jaw movable, long, very thin at base; mouth small, barbels six, more or less fringed; neck with broad dermal bones.

sŷn-ō-cious, a. [Greek synoikia=a living or dwelling together.] [SYNŒCIUM.]

Bot.: Having male and female flowers on the same head. Opposed to monœcious and diœcious (q. v.).

sŷn-ō-çī-ūm, s. [Mod. Lat., from Gr. synoikos=a living together; syn=together, and oikō=to dwell.]

Zoöl.: A genus of Botryllidæ, with one species, from the Arctic Seas. Animals semi-cartilaginous, cylindrical, stalked, solitary, or gregarious; systems circular, terminal tunicaries six to nine in a group, apertures six-rayed.

sŷ-nō-mō-sŷ, subst. [Gr. synōmosia, from syn=together, and omnymi=to swear.] Sworn brotherhood; a society in ancient Greece nearly resembling a modern political club.

sŷn-ō-nŷm, syn-o-nyme, sŷn-ōn-i-ma, s. [Fr. synonyme, from Lat. synonyma, neut. pl. of synonymus; Gr. synōnymos=of like meaning; syn=with, and onoma=a name.]

1. Ord. Lang.: A work having the same, or nearly the same, meaning as another. Properly a synonym is a word which is the precise equivalent of, or is identical in meaning with, another word of the same language and of the same grammatical class.

The term is, however, used with considerable latitude, so as to include words sufficiently alike in general signification to be liable to be confounded, but yet so different in special definition as to require to be distinguished. (Marsh.)

"It is scarcely needful to remind the reader that the word synonym is, in fact, a misnomer, as applied to words of the description in question. Literally, it implies an exact coincidence of meaning in two or more words; in which case there would be no room for discussion; but it is generally applied to words which would be more correctly termed pseudo-synonyms—i. e., words having a shade of difference, yet with a sufficient resemblance of meaning to make them liable to be confounded together."—Trench: English Synonyms. (Pref.)

2. Nat. Science: A name applied to any group, genus, or species by any author other than the original discoverer or describer, to whom the right of naming belongs. Synonyms should be arranged in strict chronological order, the name of the author being appended to each, with the date at which the name was published and the publication in which it first appeared.

"Synonyms . . . are a stumbling-block and an opprobrium in all branches of natural history."—Woodward: Mollusca (ed. Tait), p. 48.

sŷ-nōn-ŷ-mal, adj. [Eng. synonym; -al.] Synonymous.

"Repetitions here . . . and enlargements by synonymal words, before the shutting up of the period."—Instruct. for Oratory (1682), p. 95.

sŷ-nōn-ŷ-mal-lŷ, sŷ-nōn-i-mal-lŷ, adverb. [English synonymal; -ly.] As synonyms; synonymously.

"The fifth canon either useth them synonymally, or complaineth of one abuse in the preamble, and provideth against another in the decree."—Spelman: De Sepultura.

syn-o-nyme, s. [SYNONYM.]

sŷn-ō-nŷm-ic, a. [Eng. synonym; -ic.]

*1. The same as SYNONYMOUS (q. v.).

2. Of or pertaining to the different names used by various authors for the same group, genus, or species.

"The name used by Doubleday in his synonymic lists of British Lepidoptera."—Stainton: British Butterflies, ii. 447.

sŷn-ō-nŷm-ic-al, a. [Eng. synonym; -ical.] The same as SYNONYMOUS (q. v.).

"We are glad to find all synonymical lists omitted."—Athenæum, Sept. 5, 1885, p. 307.

sŷn-ō-nŷm-ic-ōn, s. [SYNONYMIC.] A dictionary of synonyms or synonymous words.

sŷn-ō-nŷm-ics, s. [SYNONYMIC.] The science or the scientific treatment of synonymous words.

sŷ-nōn-ŷ-mīst, s. [Eng. synonym; -ist.]

*1. Ord. Lang.: One who collects or explains synonyms.

2. Nat. Hist.: One who collects synonymic names and arranges them in order.

sŷn-ō-nŷm-i-tŷ, s. [Eng. synonym; -ity.] The state of being synonymous with; synonymy.

"The Germanic origin of his name, and its synonymity with Shakespeare."—Notes and Queries, July 19, 1884, p. 43.

sŷ-nōn-ŷ-mīze, v. t. [Eng. synonym; -ize.] To express by synonyms or words of the same meaning; to express the meaning of by a synonym.

"Likewise this word 'fortis' we may synonymize after all these fashions, stout, hardy, valiant, doughty, courageous, aduentrous, &c."—Camden: Remains of the English Tongue.

sŷ-nōn-ŷ-mōūs, a. [Latin synonymus; Greek synōnymos.] [SYNONYM.] Having the nature or character of a synonym; expressing the same thing by different terms; conveying the same idea.

"I have observed in a former place that will and pleasure are reputed synonymous terms."—Search: Light of Nature, vol. i. pt. i., ch. vi.

sŷ-nōn-ŷ-mōūs-lŷ, adv. [Eng. synonymous; -ly.] In a synonymous manner; in the same sense; with the same meaning.

"According to that larger notion of the word as taken synonymously with autogenes."—Cudworth: Intell. System, p. 255.

sŷ-nōn-ŷ-mŷ, s. [Lat. synonymia, from Greek synōnymia=likeness of name.] [SYNONYM.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The quality of being synonymous or of expressing the same meaning by different words.

*2. A thing of the same name.

"We having three rivers of note synonymies with her."—Drayton: Polyolbion, s. 2. (Illust.)

2. A system of synonyms.

II. Rhet.: A figure by which synonymous words are used to amplify a discourse.

sŷn-ō-phŷ-tŷ, s. [Pref. syn; o connect., and Gr. phyton=a plant.]

Bot.: The adhesion of several embryos.

bōll, bōy; pōut, jōwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, aş; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f. -cian, -tian = şan. -tion, -sion = şŷn; tion, -şion = zhŷn. -tious, -cious, -sious = şŷs. -ble, -dle, &c. = beł, deł.

sŷn-ŏp'-sŷs (pl. sŷ-nŏp'-sēs), sin-op-sis, s. [Latin synopsis, from Greek synopsis=a seeing all together; syn=together, and opsis=a sight.] A general view of the subject; a view of the whole or of all the parts at once; a kind of summary or brief statement giving a general view of some subject; a collection of heads or short paragraphs arranged so as to exhibit the whole in a general view; a conspectus.

"I shall here draw up a short synopsis of this epistle."—Warburton: Comment. on Essay on Man.

sŷn-ŏp'-tŷc, a. & s. [Gr. synoptikos=seeing all together.] [SYNOPTIC.]

A. As adj.: Of the nature of a synopsis; affording a synopsis or general view of the whole or principal parts of a thing at once.

B. As subst.: One of the Synoptic gospels (q. v.).

Synoptic-gospels, s. pl.

Biblical Criticism. The first three Gospels, Matthew, Mark, and Luke, which regard events from the same point of view, and present close resemblances to each other. Four hypotheses have been framed to account for the correspondences: (1) That the Synoptic-gospels were derived from a common written source or sources; (2) that the earlier gospels were consulted in the composition of the later ones; (3) that all the three were derived from oral tradition; or (4) that they were all derived partly from oral tradition, but that the second was also copied from the first, and the third from the first and second. The Synoptic-gospels treat of the humanity rather than the divinity of Jesus, though not in any way ignoring the latter. [GOSPEL, II. 2.]

sŷn-ŏp'-tŷc-al, adj. [Eng. synoptic; -al.] The same as SYNOPTIC (q. v.).

"So many synoptical tables calculated for his monthly use."—Evelyn: Kalendarium.

sŷn-ŏp'-tŷc-al-lŷ, adv. [Eng. synoptical; -ly.] In a synoptical manner; so as to afford a synopsis of anything.

"I shall more synoptically here insert a catalogue of all dying materials."—Sprat: History of the Royal Society, p. 295.

sŷn-ŏp'-tŷst, s. [Eng. synopt(ic); -ist.] One of the writers of the Synoptic Gospels; Matthew, Mark, or Luke.

sŷn-ŏ-rhŷ-zoŷs, a. [Pref. syn-; o connect., and Gr. rhiza=a root.]

Bot.: Having a radicle, the point of which is united to the albumen.

sŷn-ŏs-tē-ŏg'-rā-phŷ, s. [Pref. syn-, and Eng. osteography.]

Anat.: A description of the joints of the body.

sŷn-ŏs-tē-ŏl'-ŏ-gŷ, s. [Pref. syn-, and English osteology (q. v.).]

Anat.: A treatise upon the joints of the body.

sŷn-ŏs-tē-ŏ-tōme, s. [Pref. syn-, and English osteome.]

Surg.: A dismembering knife.

sŷn-ŏs-tē-ŏt'-ŏ-mŷ, s. [Pref. syn-, and English osteotomy.]

Surg.: Dissection of the joints.

sŷn-ŏs-tō-sis, s. [Pref. syn-, and Gr. osteon=a bone.]

Anat.: Premature obliteration of certain sutures of the skull.

sŷn-ŏ-tŷs, s. [Prefix syn-, and Gr. ous (genit. otos)=the ear.]

Zoöl.: A genus of Plecoti (q. v.). Inner margins of ears uniting on forehead slightly in front of the eyes; feet slender, with long toes. Two species, Synotus barbastellus, ranging from the south of England to the Crimea, and S. darjelingensis, from India.

sŷ-nŏ'-vŷ-a, s. [Gr. syn=with, and ŏn; Lat. ovum=an egg.]

Anat. & Chem.: Joint oil, a fluid by which the joints of animals are lubricated. It is viscid and transparent, is of a yellowish or faintly reddish tint, and a slightly saline taste. According to Frerichs, the synovia of the ox consists of 94.85 water, 0.56 mucus and cells, 0.07 fat, 3.51 albumen and extracted matter, and 0.99 salts.

sŷ-nŏ'-vŷ-al, a. [English synovi(a); -al.] Pertaining to or consisting of synovia; secreting a lubricating fluid. There are synovial bursæ, capsules, folds or fringes, membranes, sheaths, &c.

"The most serious kind of synovial enlargements."—Field, Aug. 4, 1885.

Anat.: Membranes resembling serous membranes; but lubricated by synovia. They surround the cavities of joints, besides existing in other directions, their function being to lessen friction and facilitate motion. They are placed in three classes—articular, vesicular, and vaginal.

synovial-rheumatism, s.

Pathol.: Rheumatism specially affecting the synovial members covering the articular extremities of the bones, increasing the synovia in the closed synovial sacs. It chiefly affects the knee-joint, which has the largest synovial membrane in the body.

sŷn-ŏ-vŷ-tŷs, s. [English synov(ia); suff. -itis.]

Pathol.: Inflammation of the synovial membrane. It sometimes occurs in connection with scarlatina.

†sŷn-sēp'-a-loŷs, adj. [Pref. syn-; Eng. sepal, and suff. -ous.]

Bot.: Gamosepalous.

sŷn'-spērm-ŷ, s. [Pref. syn-, and Gr. sperma=seed.]

Bot.: Union of the seed. (Masters.)

sŷn-tăc'-tŷc, sŷn-tăc'-tŷc-al, a. [Greek syn-taktos=put in order.] [SYNTAX.]

I. Ord. Lang.: Conjoined; fitted to each other.

II. Gram.: Pertaining or according to the rules of syntax or grammatical construction.

"A figure is divided into tropes, &c., grammatical, orthographical, syntactical."—Peacham: Garden of Eloquence, bk. i.

sŷn-tăc'-tŷc-al-lŷ, adv. [Eng. syntactical; -ly.] In a syntactical manner; in accordance with the rules of syntax; as regards syntax.

sŷn-tăg'-ma-tŷte, s. [Gr. syntagma (genit. syntagmatis)=arrangement, putting in order.]

Min.: A name given by Breithaupt to the black hornblende of Monte Somma, Vesuvius.

sŷn-tăx, sŷn-tăx'-is, syn-taxe, s. [Lat. syn-taxis; Gr. syn-taxis=an arrangement: syn=together, and taxis=order; tassō=to arrange.]

I. Ord. Lang.: Connected system or order; union of things.

"To the knowledge of the most contemptible effect in nature, 'tis necessary to know the whole syntax of causes."—Glanvill: Vanity of Dogmatizing, ch. xxii.

II. Gram.: That part of grammar which deals with the construction of sentences or the due arrangement of words or members of sentences in their mutual arrangements. It includes concord and government, and the order of words, or collocation.

"Who feed a pupil's intellect with store Of syntax, truly, but with little more."

Cowper: Tirocinium, 623.

sŷn-tēc'-tŷc, sŷn-tēc'-tŷc-al, a. [Gr. syntēktikos.] Pertaining or relating to syntexis (q. v.).

sŷn-tē-leŷ-a, s. [Gr.]

Greek Antiq.: An association of Athenian citizens, numbering five, six, or fifteen, who equipped a ship for the public service at their joint expense.

"Smaller proprietors were joined together in a kind of society, for which our language does not afford a special name, but which an Athenian would have called a Synteleia; and each society was required to furnish, according to its means, a horse soldier or a foot soldier."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. iii.

sŷn-tēr'-ē-sis, s. [Gr., from syntērēseō=to watch closely: syn=together, and tērēō=to watch.]

1. Ord. Lang.: Conscience regarded as the internal repository of the laws of right and wrong.

"On her a royal damsel still attends,
And faithful counsellor synteresis."

Fletcher: Purple Island, vi.

2. Therapeut.: Preservative or prophylactic treatment.

sŷn-tēr-rēt'-ŷc, a. [Gr. syntērētikos.]

Medicine: Pertaining to synteresis; preserving health; prophylactic.

sŷn-tē-thŷs, subst. [Pref. syn-, and Lat. tethys (q. v.).]

Zoöl.: A genus of Clavinellidæ, with a single species, from Applecross Sound, Ross-shire. Animals compound, gelatinous, orbicular, sessile; individuals very prominent, arranged sub-concentrically in the common mass; branchial and atrial orifices simple. The individual ascidians are, when full-grown, two inches in length.

sŷn-tēt'-ŷc, a. [SYNTECTIC.]

sŷn-tēx'-is, subst. [Gr., from syntēkō=to melt away.]

Med.: A wasting of the body; a deep consumption.

sŷn-thēr'-māl, a. [Pref. syn-, and Gr. thermē=heat.]

Meteor., &c.: Having the same degree of heat.

sŷn-thē-sis, s. Lat., from Gr. synthesis=a putting together: syn=together, and thesis=a putting.] [THESIS.]

I. Ord. Lang.: The act of joining or putting two or more things together; composition.

II. Technically:

1. Chem.: The building up of more or less complex bodies by the direct union of their elements, or of groups of elements. Thus, water can be produced synthetically by the union of two atoms of hydrogen with one atom of oxygen.

2. Logic: The method by composition, in opposition to the method of resolution or analysis. In synthesis, we reason from axioms, definitions, and already known principles, until we arrive at a desired conclusion. Of this nature are most of the processes of geometrical reasoning. In synthesis, we ascend from particular cases to general ones; in analysis, we descend from general cases to particulars.

"Each of the words Idea, In, Mind, involves a synthesis, and the proposition—Ideas exist in mind, is a synthesis of syntheses. Passing from the assumption of idealism, to its argument, it might be shown that each of its syllogisms is a synthesis of syntheses; and that its conclusion, reached by putting together many syllogisms, is a synthesis of syntheses of syntheses. Instead, then, of the realistic belief being objectionable on the ground of its synthetic nature, its superiority is, that it is less open to this objection than any other belief which can be framed."—Herbert Spencer: Principles of Psychology.

3. Surg.: The operation by which divided parts are united.

sŷn'-thē-sŷse, v. t. [Eng. synthes(is); -ise.] To combine or bring together, as two or more things; to unite in one.

sŷn'-thē-sist, s. [Eng. synthes(is); -ist.] One who employs synthesis, or who follows synthetic methods.

sŷn-thēt'-ŷc, sŷn-thēt'-ŷc-al, adj. [Gr. synthetikos=skilled in putting together; synthetēs=one who puts together.] [SYNTHESIS.] Pertaining or relating to synthesis; consisting in or according to synthesis.

"The methods [he observes] of attaining a knowledge of nature, may be two; either the analytic or the synthetic. The first is proceeding from the causes to the effects. The second, from the effects to the causes."—Hooke: Posthumous Works, p. 330.

synthetic-types, s. pl.

Biol.: (See extract.)

"Synthetic-types are those which combine in a well-balanced measure features of several types occurring as distinct, only at a later time. Sauroid Fishes and Ichthyosaurs are more distinctly synthetic than prophetic types."—Agassiz: Classification, p. 178.

sŷn-thēt'-ŷc-al-lŷ, adv. [Eng. synthetical; -ly.] In a synthetical manner; by synthesis; according to the rules of synthesis.

sŷn-thēt-ize, v. t. [SYNTHETIC.] To unite in regular structure.

sŷn'-tō-mŷ, s. [Gr. syntomēa, syntemnō=to cut short.] Brevity, conciseness.

sŷn'-tōn-in, s. [Gr. syntonía=stretching: syn=together, and teinō=to stretch.]

Chem.: Muscle-fibrin. Liebig's name for a white, opaque, gelatinous substance, prepared by slightly heating muscle freed from blood with dilute hydrochloric acid, filtering, and precipitating with sodic carbonate. It is soluble in dilute hydrochloric acid and in feebly alkaline liquid, but insoluble in a solution of sodium chloride. A similar substance, giving all the reactions of syntonin, is obtained by treating egg albumen with dilute hydrochloric acid. [MUSCULIN.]

sŷn'-tō-nŷ, s. [Gr. syntonos, in harmony.] The electrical harmony of particular transmitters and receivers in a wireless system of telegraphy. [ELECTRIC TELEGRAPH.]

sŷn-zŷŷ'-i-a, s. [Pref. syn-, and Gr. zygon, zygos=a yoke.]

Bot.: The point of junction of opposite cotyledons.

sŷ-phēr, s. [Etym. doubtful.] (See compound.)

Carp.: A lap joint for the edges of boards, leaving a flat or flush surface.

sŷ-phēr-ŷng, s. [SYPHER.]

Shipwright: Lapping the chamfered edge of one plank over the similarly chamfered edge of another, so as to form a joint with a plane surface.

sŷ-phŷl'-i-dēs, s. pl. [SYPHILIS.]

Pathol.: Skin affections of syphilitic origin. They are usually copper-colored rashes, scales, papules, pustules, crusts, ulcers, and cicatrices, and have been arranged in eight groups: Vegetative, exanthematous, vesicular, squamous, papular, pustular, bulbous, and tubercular.

sŷph-ŷ-lŷ-phŷ-bŷ-a, s. [Eng. syphilis, and Gr. phobos=fear.]

Pathol.: Syphilitic monomania; a morbid fear of being affected by syphilis, producing some imaginary symptoms of the disease, and often leading to suicide. The most obstinate cases are in women.

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camēl, hēr, thēre; pine, pīt, sīre, sīr, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre. wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rāle, fūll; trŷ, Sŷrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

sýph'-i-lis, s. [A word introduced by Sauvages, from Syphilus, the name of a shepherd in Fracastoro's poem, Syphilus, sive Morbus Gallicus: Gr. sys=a hog, and philos=dear, loving. (Mahn.)]

Pathol.: A disease due to the introduction of a specific poison into the system by direct contact of an infected with a healthy surface. In the majority of cases syphilis is venereal; but it is by no means necessarily so, as the poison may be communicated to the fingers (as is often the case with medical men and midwives) from touching diseased parts, or it may be introduced by infected lymph in vaccination. It is characterized in the first instance by the presence of a single sore, the hard chancre, and frequently by induration of the absorbent glands, chiefly those of the groin. It has probably existed from time immemorial wherever promiscuous sexual intercourse has prevailed, though the statement has often been made that it was first brought to Europe by the followers of Columbus. Mention of it occurs, however, in the ancient literature of China, and before the period above fixed, places called stews existed in the borough of Southwark, England, where prostitutes suffering from this contagious disease were confined. In the secondary or constitutional form, the throat is chiefly affected, frightful ulceration being common, with cutaneous eruptions, affections of the nose, ears, joints, and bones. Tertiary symptoms also occur, with the presence of nodes or gummata. In its constitutional form the foetus in utero, or newly-born infant is frequently affected.

sýph'-i-lit'-ic, a. [Eng. syphilis]; -itic.] Pertaining to or of the nature of syphilis; as, syphilitic deafness, &c.; affected with or suffering from syphilis; useful in the cure of syphilis.

sýph'-i-li-zā'-tion, s. [Eng. syphiliz(e); -ation.]

Pathol.: Saturation of the system by inoculation with syphilitic virus. This method was introduced by M. Auzais Turenne in 1850.

"The system seemed to become protected, as in ordinary inoculation and vaccination, and a state or diathesis was produced, in which the body was no longer capable of being affected by syphilis; and the process by which this is accomplished is that to which the name syphilization belongs."—Copland: Dict. Prac. Med. (ed. 1886), p. 489.

sýph'-i-lize, v. t. [Eng. syphilis]; -ize.] To saturate or inoculate with syphilitic matter as a cure for or a preventive against the disease.

sýph'-i-lō-dēr'-ma, (pl. sýph'-i-lō-dēr'-ma-ta), subst. [Eng. syphilis (q. v.), and Gr. derma=skin.] Pathol.: A skin disease produced by syphilis.

sýph'-i-lōid, a. [Eng. syphilis, suff. -oid.] Resembling syphilis; having the character of syphilis.

sý-phīl'-ō-ma (pl. sýph'-i-lōm'-a-ta), s. [As if from a Greek word, but really a modern derivative from syphilis (q. v.).]

Pathol.: A tumor produced by syphilis. There are syphilomata of the lungs and of the heart. (Tanner.)

sý-phōn, s. [SIPHON.]

sý-phōn'-ic, a. [SIPHONIC.]

†sý-phōn-ō-stōm'-a-ta, s. pl. [SIPHONOSTOMATA.]

syr'-en (yr as ir), s. [SIREN.]

Sýr'-i-āc, a. & s. [Lat. Syriacus.]

A. As adj.: Of or pertaining to Syria or its language.

B. As subst.: The language spoken by the Syrians, especially the language of the ancient Syrians. It belongs to the Semitic family of languages, and differs little from the Chaldee or Eastern Aramaic.

Syriac-version, s.

Biblical Versions: Any version of the Bible in the Syriac language. The most important part is the Peschito (q. v.); the next is the Philoxenian, or Syro-Philoxenian, made by Philoxenus, Bishop of Hierapolis (A. D. 488-518). It is confined to the New Testament.

Sýr'-i-a-çism, s. [Eng. Syriac; -ism.] A Syriac idiom, phrase, or expression.

Sýr'-i-ān, a. & s. [See def.]

A. As adj.: Of or pertaining to Syria or its inhabitants; Syriac.

B. As subst.: A native or inhabitant of Syria.

Syrian-bear, s.

Zoöl.: Ursus syriacus, from Western Asia. It is about the size of the Brown Bear, but of a much lighter color, varying from fulvous-brown to fulvous-white, according to the season of the year.

Syrian-Catholics, s. pl.

Church Hist.: A term which should properly include all Christians using a Syriac liturgy, but confined by ecclesiastical writers to converts from the Jacobite or Monophysite Church in Syria.

Syrian Jacobites, s. pl.

Church Hist.: The members of the church that once pervaded Syria. The great body of them now reside near Mosul and Mardin, in Mesopotamia, others are in or near Aleppo. A large colony, now however much reduced by conversions to Roman Catholicism, exists in Malabar and Travancore in India. They call themselves Jacobites, nominally from the patriarch Jacob, really from Jacob Bardæus, Bishop of Orfa (Edessa), who died in 558, and who was successful in reuniting the Monophysites. They use the Syriac language in their liturgy.

Bot.: Peganum harmala.

Sýr'-i-ān-ism, s. [Eng. Syrian; -ism.] A Syriac idiom, phrase, or expression.

Sýr'-i-āsm, s. [Eng. Syri(a); -asm.] The same as SYRIANISM (q. v.).

"The Scripture Greek is observed to be full of Syriasm and Hebraisms."—Warburton: Doctrine of Grace.

sý-rin'-ga, s. [Lat. syrix; Gr. syrix=a pipe. So called because the branches are long, straight, and with large pith.]

Botany:

1. A synonym of Philadelphia. [3.]

2. Lilac; a genus of Fraxineæ. Deciduous shrubs, with simple leaves, and very fragrant flowers in terminal thyrsoid panicles. Calyx small, four-toothed; corolla funnel-shaped, its limb four-parted; stamens two; stigma bifid; fruit a capsule, with two boat-shaped valves, having a dissepiment in the middle, two cells, and two seeds. Known species about six. Natives apparently of south-eastern Europe and central and eastern Asia. Syringa vulgaris is the Lilac (q. v.). S. persica is a smaller species or variety, with pinnatifid leaves, supposed to have come from Persia. There are three common varieties of it in nurseries, the White, the Cut-leaved, and the Sage-leaved Persian Lilac. S. josikæa, a Transylvanian shrub, has scentless flowers. The leaves of S. emodi, a large Himalayan shrub, are eaten by goats.

3. (Pl.): The Philadelphaceæ (q. v.).

sýr'-inge, sír'-inge, s. [Fr. syningue, from Lat. syngem, accus. of syrix=a reed, pipe, tube; Gr. syrix=a reed, a tube, a whistle; Sp. siringa; Ital. sciringa.] A small portable hydraulic instrument of the pump kind, used to draw in a quantity of water or other liquid, and eject the same with force. In its simplest form it consists of a small cylindrical tube having an air-tight piston fitted with a rod and handle at the upper end. The lower end terminates in a small tapering tube. This being immersed in the fluid, the piston is drawn back, and the liquid is forced into the cylinder by atmospheric pressure. On pushing the piston back again to the lower end of the cylinder the liquid is ejected in a jet. The syringe is used by surgeons, &c., for washing wounds, injecting liquids into animal bodies and similar purposes. Larger forms are used for watering plants, trees, &c.

"The like device to this, namely, clysters, we learned first of a fowle in the same Ægypt, which is called Ibis (or the black Storke). This bird having a crooked and hooked bill, useth it in steed of a syringe or pipe, to squirt water into that part, whereby it is most kind and holmesome to void the dounge and excrements of meat, and so purgeth and cleanseth her bodie."—P. Holland. Pliny, bk. viii., ch. xxvii.

¶ Pneumatic Syringe: [PNEUMATIC SYRINGE.]

syringe-engine, s. A machine on the principle of the syringe, formerly used as a fire-engine.

syringe-valve, subst. A peculiarly constructed valve used in syringes. The valve-guide stem has an end knob, by which its falling out is prevented.

sýr'-inge, v. t. & i. [SYRINGE, s.]

A. Transitive:

1. To inject by means of a syringe.

"I syringed into a dog's jugular vein about two quarts of warm water."—Boyle: Works, vi. 464.

2. To wash or cleanse by injections from a syringe.

B. Intrans.: To inject water by means of a syringe.

sý-rin'-gō-dēn'-drōn, s. [Gr. syrix, synggos=a pipe or tube, and dendron=tree.]

Palæobot.: A genus of coal plants founded by Sternberg, and adopted by Brongniart. Trunk furrowed, with equal and parallel ribs. Some of the species included in it are now placed under Sigillaria.

sý-rin'-gōp'-ōr-a, s. pl. [Gr. syrix (genitive synggos)=a pipe, and poros=a passage; a pore.]

Palæont.: A genus of Halysitidæ. Corallum fasciculate, with cylindrical corallites united by horizontal connecting processes. Silurian to the Carboniferous.

sý-rin'-gō-tōme, subst. [Greek syrix (genit. synggos)=a pipe, a fistula, and tōmē=a cutting.] Surgery: A bistoury, concave on its edge, and terminated by a long, flexible, probe-pointed stylet. Formerly used for operations for fistula in ano.

sý-rin'-gōt'-ō-mý, subst. [French syringotomie.] [SYRINGOTOME.]

Surgery: The operation or act of cutting for fistula.

sýr-in'-gōx'-ý-lōn, subst. [Gr. syrix (genit. synggos)=a pipe, and xylon=wood.]

Palæobotany: A genus of plants believed by its discoverer, Principal Dawson, to be angiospermous. Known species one, Syringoxylon mirabile, from the Devonian of New York.

sýr'-in-x, s. [Lat., from Gr. syrix=a pipe, a tube.

1. Compar. Anat.: The inferior larynx, a modification of the trachea where it joins the bronchi. It is the organ of song in birds.

2. Music: The same as PANPIPE (q. v.).

3. Surg.: A fistula.

4. Zoöl.: A genus of Sipunculidæ. Proboscis shorter than the body; cylindrical, with a circle of short-fingered tentacles around the tip.

sýr'-ma, s. [Gr., from syro=to drag, to trail.]

Greek Antiq.: A long dress, reaching to the ground, worn by tragic actors.

†sýr-ni'-i-næ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. sygni(um); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -inæ.]

Ornith.: A sub-family of Bubonidæ, with three genera: Asio, Nyctala, and Syrnium (q. v.).

sýr'-ni-ūm, s. [Etym. doubtful.]

Ornith.: A genus of Syrninæ (q. v.). The type is Syrnium aluco, or Aluco flammea, the Tawny Owl. [STRIX, 2.]

sýr'-ōp, s. [SYRUP.]

sýr'-phī-dæ, s. pl. [Lat. syrph(us); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Entom.: A family of Diptera, tribe Athericera (having the antennæ of three joints, the apical one with a bristle). The Syrphidæ have the antennal bristle finely feathered; the eyes are large, meeting in the males; the ocelli three; proboscis generally short, the terminal lobes fleshy, inclosing three bristles; palpi small, with one joint; abdomen flattened, with five segments; tarsi with two pulvilli. Smooth or hairy insects, often seen hovering almost without motion over the flowers of Composites or other plants, some of them looking like bees, from which they may at once be distinguished by their having only two wings, and being destitute of a sting. The species are numerous, and the larvæ diverse in habits. Most of the latter feed on the roots or bulbs of plants, or live in decaying wood, mud, or sewers, or in the water, or as parasites in the nests of wasps and humble bees, or crawling over plants in quest of Aphides. Genera more than forty, and among them Syrphus, Volucella, Eristalis, Helophilus, &c.

sýr'-phūs, subst. [Gr. syrphos, serphos=a small winged insect, perhaps a gnat or an ant.]

Entom.: The typical genus of Syrphidæ (q. v.). The larvæ feed on aphides. One of the most common is Syrphus pyrastris, a blue-black fly, with whitish or yellowish transverse bands on the abdomen, black thighs, and yellowish legs. It is sometimes mistaken for a wasp. The larvæ is a footless grub, living on plants infested by aphides.

sýr-rhāp'-tēs, s. [Gr. syrhaptos=sewn together; syrhaptō=to sew together; syn=together, and rhapto=to sew.]

Ornith.: A genus of Pteroclidæ (q. v.), with two species. Bill small, conical, nostrils concealed by feathers, tarsi hirsute; toes short, concrete, hirsute above, hallux absent; the two middle tail-feathers and first two quills of wings produced into pointed setaceous filaments. They normally range from Tartary, Thibet, and Mongolia, to the country round Pekin, and occasionally visit Eastern Europe; but in 1863 great numbers of them appeared in Europe, and reached westward to the shores of the Atlantic.

sýrt, s. [Fr. syrt, from Lat. syrtis; Gr. syrtis=a sandbank.] [SYRTIS.] A quicksand.

sýr'-tīc, adj. [Eng. syrt; -ic.] Pertaining or relating to a syrt or quicksand; of the nature of a quicksand.

sýr'-tīs, s. [Lat., from Gr. syrtis, from syro=to draw.]

1. Ord. Lang.: A quicksand. (Originally applied especially to two sandbanks on the north coast of Africa.)

"Quench'd in a boggy syrtis, neither sea, Nor good dry land." Milton: P. L., ii. 939.

2. Entom.: A genus of Bugs, family Membranaceæ (q. v.), having the sides of the abdomen dilated. Two species, Syrtis crassipes and S. monstrosa, occur on the continent of Europe.

bōil, bōy; pōut, jōwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bençh; go, gem; thin, thiç; sin, aç; expect, Xenophon, eçist. ph = f. -cian, -tian = shan. -tion, -sion = shün; -t̃ion, -şion = zhün. -tious, -cious, -sious = shūs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bəl. dəl.

sŷr'-ŭp, *sŷr'-ŭp, *sŷr'-ŭp, *sŷr'-rŭp, s. [O. Fr. syrup, ysserop (Fr. sirop), from Sp. xarope=a medicinal drink, from Arab. sharāb, shurāb=wine or any beverage, syrup, from shariba=he drank; Italian siroppo.] [SHRUB (2), SHERBET.]

I. Ord. Lang.: In popular language, the uncrystallizable fluid finally separated from crystallized sugar in the process of refining, either by the draining of sugar in loaves, or by being forcibly ejected by the centrifugal apparatus in preparing moist sugar, commonly known as golden syrup. By sugar manufacturers the term syrup is applied to all strong saccharine solutions which contain sugar in a condition capable of being crystallized out, the ultimate uncrystallizable fluid being distinguished as molasses or treacle.

"The juice which trickles into these vessels is collected by persons who climb the trees for that purpose morning and evening, and is the common drink of every individual upon the island; yet a much greater quantity is drawn off than is consumed in this use, and of the surplus they make both a syrup and coarse sugar."—Cook: First Voyage, bk. iii., ch. ix.

II. Technically:

1. Chem.: A saturated, or nearly saturated, solution of sugar in water.

2. Pharmacy: Syrupus; a preparation in which sugar forms an important ingredient, and gives a peculiar consistence to the liquid. Its general use is to disguise the flavor of drugs; but in some cases, as in that of the iron iodide, the sugar preserves the active ingredient from undergoing chemical change. About seventeen syrups are used in pharmacy. Among them are Syrupus aurantii, S. limonis, S. papaveris, S. sennæ, &c. (Garrod.)

"His drugs, his drinks, and syrups doth apply, To heat his blood and quicken luxury."

Drayton: The Owl.

sŷr'-ŭped, *sŷr'-ŭpt, a. [English syrup; -ed.] Sweetened by or as by moistening or mixing with syrup.

"Yet when there haps a honey fall, We'll lick the syrup leaves."

Drayton: Quest of Cynthia.

sŷr'-ŭp-ŷ, sŷr'-ŭp-ŷ, adj. [English syrup; -y.] Like syrup; partaking of the nature or quality of syrup.

"Apples are of a syrupy, tenacious nature."—Mortimer: Husbandry.

sŷs-sar-cō'-sŷs, s. [Gr., from syssarkōō=to unite by flesh; sy, for syn=with, together, and sarx (genit. sarkos)=flesh.]

1. Anat.: A species of union of bones, in which one bone is united to another by means of an intervening muscle, as in the connection of the os hyoides to the sternum.

2. Surg.: The method of curing wounds by promoting the growth of new flesh.

sŷs-tāl'-tŷc, a. [Lat. systalticus; Gr. systaltikos=drawing together; systellō=to draw together; syn=together, and stellō=to set in order.]

Physiol.: Capable of or produced by alternate contraction and dilatation. Used spec. of the heart.

sŷs'-ta-sŷs, s. [Greek, from synistēmi=to place together.] [SYSTEM.] A sitting together; a political union or constitution.

"It is a worse preservative of a general constitution than the syntaxis of Crete, or the confederation of Poland."—Burke: Reflections on the Revolution in France.

sŷs'-tēm, *sys-tēme, s. [Lat. systema, from Gr. systema=a complex whole put together, a system; sy, for syn=with, together, and stē, the base of kistēmi=to stand; Fr. système; Sp. & Ital. sistema.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. A combination or assemblage of things adjusted into a regular and connected whole; a number of things or parts so connected and arranged as to make one complex thing; things connected according to a scheme; as a system of canals or railways a system of forces acting upon a body.

2. An assemblage of parts or organs in an animal body which are composed of the same tissue or are essentially necessary to the performance of some function: as the nervous system, the vascular system, &c.

3. Hence applied to the body itself; as, to take nourishment into the system.

4. The whole scheme of creation regarded as forming one complete plan or whole; the universe.

5. A plan or scheme according to which things are connected or combined into a whole; an assemblage of facts, or of principles and conclusions scientifically arranged or disposed according to certain mutual relations, so as to form a complete whole; as, a system of philosophy, a system of government, &c.

6. Method, order, regularity; as, He has no system in his business.

7. Manner or way in which things are managed; plan of transacting business.

II Technically:

1. Anat.: A term introduced by Bichat, used of any structure taken as a whole; as, the nervous system.

*2. Ancient Music: An interval compounded, or supposed to be compounded, of several lesser intervals, as the octave, the elements of which are called diatems.

3. Astron.: A theory of the movements and mutual relations of the heavenly bodies, especially of the sun, moon, and planets, and the laws by which these are regulated. Used of the Ptolemaic System, the Copernican System, the Newtonian System, &c. (all which see).

"The great system in which the sun acts the part of the primary, and the planets of its satellites."—Herschel: Astronomy, §533.

4. Biol.: Method of arrangement on a comprehensive plan. Used specially in Botany, where first Linnæus' Sexual System—the Artificial—for a time prevailed, to be followed by the Natural System, which is now in use. By the Natural System some understand only the placing together of such plants or animals as resemble each other; some hold that it reveals the plan of the Creator, while Darwin (Origin of Species, ch. xiv.) thinks that it is the arrangement by similarity of characters of animals or plants having a community of descent.

5. Fine Arts: A collection of the rules and principles upon which an artist works.

6. Geology: A term introduced by Sir Roderick Murchison for a formation or division of the Palæozoic, Secondary, or Tertiary Rocks. (See extract.)

"In the work on Russia the Devonian, Carboniferous, and Permian rocks were each denominated systems, but as explained in this work, they are now viewed as groups that constitute the Upper Palæozoic System, the Silurian being the Lower Palæozoic."—Murchison: Siluria (ed. 1854), p. 310. (Note.)

†7. Math.: A term used of equations related to each other in the same problem, or of curves or surfaces connected by any law.

system-maker, s. One who makes or constructs a system or systems. (Usually in contempt.)

"System-makers have endeavored to interpret it away."—Warburton: Works, vol. ix., ser. 5.

system-monger, s. One who is fond of forming or framing systems.

sŷs-tē-māt'-ŷc, sŷs-tē-māt'-ŷc-ŷl, a. [Greek systematikos, from systematos, genit. of systema=a system (q. v.); Fr. système.]

1. Pertaining to system; according to system; methodical; formed or arranged with regular connection and subordination of parts to each other and to the design of the whole.

2. Proceeding or working according to regular system or method; as, a systematic writer.

*3. Of or pertaining to the system of the universe; cosmical.

sŷs-tē-māt'-ŷc-ŷl-ŷy, adv. [Eng. systematical; -ly.] In a systematic manner; in form of a system; methodically.

sŷs-tēm-at-ŷsm, s. [Eng. systemat(ic); -ism.] Reduction of things into a system.

sŷs-tēm-at-ŷst, subst. [Eng. systemat(ic); -ist.]

1. One who forms a system or systems; a systematizer.

2. One who adheres to a system.

sŷs-tē-māt-i-zā'-tion, s. [Eng. systematiz(e); -ation.] The act of systematizing; the act or process of reducing or forming things into a system.

sŷs-tēm-at-ŷze, v. t. [Eng. systemat(ic); -ize.] To reduce or form into a system or regular method.

sŷs-tēm-at-ŷz-ēr, s. [Eng. systematiz(e); -er.] One who reduces or forms things into a regular system.

sŷs-tēm-a-tŷl'-ŷ-ŷy, s. [Greek systema (genit. systematos)=a system (q. v.), and logos=a discourse.] Knowledge or information regarding systems.

sŷs-tēm'-ŷc, a. [Eng. system; -ic.]

*1. Ord. Lang.: Of or pertaining to a system.

2. Anat., Pathol., &c.: Of or belonging to the body as a whole; as, the systemic arteries, the systemic veins.

sŷs-tēm-i-zā'-tion, subst. [Eng. systemiz(e); -ation.] The same as SYSTEMATIZATION (q. v.).

sŷs-tēm-ŷze, v. t. [English system; -ize.] To reduce to a system; to systematize.

sŷs-tēm-ŷz-ēr, s. [Eng. systemiz(e); -er.] A systematizer.

sŷs-tēm-less, a. [Eng. system; -less.]

1. Ord. Lang.: Without system.

2. Biol.: Not obviously presenting the characters of the well-marked divisions of the animal or vegetable kingdom, as the Protozoa among animals and the microscopic algæ or minute fungals among plants.

sŷs'-tŷl-ē, s. [Gr. systolē=a contracting, drawing together; systellō=to draw together; sy, for syn=together, and stellō=to equip, to set in order; Fr. systole.]

1. Gram.: The shortening of a long syllable.

2. Physiol.: The contraction of any contractile cavity, specially of the auricles and ventricles in the heart.

sŷs-tŷl'-ŷc, a. [Eng. systol(e); -ic.] Pertaining or relating to systole; contracting; as, systolic aortic, mitral, pulmonary, and tricuspid murmurs.

sŷs'-tŷle, a. [Gr. systylos, from sy, for syn=with, together, and stylos=a pillar, a column; Fr. systyle.]

Arch.: Having columns standing close:

(1) Having columns placed in such a manner that they are two diameters of a column apart.

(2) Having a row of columns set close together all round, as the Parthenon at Athens.

sŷ'-vēr, s. [From the same root as sewer (q. v.).] A covered drain; a sewer, a gutter; the grating or trap of a street drain. (Scotch.)

sŷves, s. [CHIVE (2).]

Bot.: Allium schœnoprasum. (Jamieson.)

sŷx-hende-man, a. [A. S. six=six; hund, hundred, and man.]

Old Sax. Law: A man possessed of property to the value of six hundred shillings.

sŷ-zŷg'-ŷ-ŷm, sŷ-zŷg'-ŷ-ŷm, s. [Gr. syzygios=yoked together, paired. So named from the way in which the branches and leaves are united by pairs.]

Bot.: A genus of Myrtæ. Trees or shrubs, with the flowers in cymes or corymbs, the calyx with its limb undivided; the petals, four or five, inserted into the throat of the calyx and fugitive; stamens many, similarly inserted; the fruit baccate, one-celled by abortion; seeds one or two. Syzygium jambolanum, called also Eugenia jambolana, is a moderate-sized tree, wild or cultivated all over India. The bark is astringent, and is used, as are the leaves, in dysentery. The decoction of the bark constitutes a wash for the teeth; its fresh juice, with goat's milk, a medicine for the diarrhœa of children. A vinegar prepared from the unripe fruit is a stomachic, carminative, and diuretic. The fruit is astringent, but is eaten by the natives, who in time of famine consume also the kernels. The leaves of S. terebinthaceum are used in Madagascar to impart an aroma to baths. S. guineensis is worshipped in Gambia and the fruit is eaten.

sŷ'-zŷ-ŷy, s. [Gr. syzygia=union, conjunction; syzygos=conjoined; sy, for syn=with, together, and zeugnyni=to join; zygon=a yoke.]

1. Astron. (pl.): Linear relations; a term used of the points of a planet, or of the moon's orbit, at which the planet or the moon is in opposition to or conjunction with the sun.

2. Pros.: The coupling of different feet together in Greek or Latin verse.

szā'-bŷ-ŷte (sz as tz), s. [After Prof. J. Szabó, of Budapest; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A mineral occurring in minute crystals in cavities of an andesite, Transylvania. Crystallization, triclinic. Hardness, 6-7; specific gravity, 3.505; luster, vitreous; color, hair-brown to hyacinth-red. Composition: Essentially a silicate of iron and lime. Now shown to be related to hypersthene (q. v.).

szai-bē'-ŷ-ŷte, s. [After Herr Szaibelyi; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Mineral.: A mineral occurring in small nodules bristling with acicular crystals in a limestone at Werksthal, Hungary. Hardness, 3-4; specific gravity, 3.0; color, externally white, internally yellow. Composition: After separating impurities, essentially a hydrous borate of magnesia.

szās'-kā-ŷte (sz as tz), s. [After Szaska, Hungary, where found; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: An earthy variety of calamine (zinc carbonate) (q. v.), stated to contain cadmium.

szmŷk'-ŷte (sz as tz), subst. [After Herr Szmik; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: An amorphous mineral, stalactitic. Hardness, 1.5; specific gravity, 3.15; color, whitish; on fracture, reddish-white to rose-red. Composition: Sulphuric acid, 47.43; protoxide of manganese, 42.01; water, 10.65=100.09. Found at Felsöbanya, Hungary.

szŷ-pēl'-kā (sz as tz), s. [Russ.]

Music: A kind of oboe, about fifteen inches in length, made of elder wood, having a brass mouthpiece and eight large and seven small finger holes. It is a popular instrument in Southern Russia.

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camel, hēr, thēre; pine, pīt, sire, sŷr, marine; gŷ, pŷt, or, wŷre, wolf, wŷrk, whŷ, sŷn; mŷte, cŷb, cŷre, unite, cŷr, rāle, fŷll; trŷ, Sŷrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

THE twentieth letter and the sixteenth consonant of the English alphabet, is a sharp, mute consonant, and closely allied to d, both being dentals. It is formed by pressing the tip of the tongue closely against the root of the upper teeth, and it differs from d only in being non-vocal, while d is uttered with voice. T followed by h in the same syllable has two distinct sounds; the one surd or breathed, as in think, thank, thought; the other sonant, or vocal, as in this, that, though. Ti before a vowel, and unaccented, usually passes into sh, as in nation, portion, partial, which are pronounced nashon, porshon, parshal. When s or x precede ti, the t retains its proper sound, as in question, though before u it is often softened into ch (as in church), as also in such words as mixture, posture, &c. In accordance with Grimm's law (q. v.), t in English (as also in Dutch, Icelandic, Gothic, &c.) is represented in Latin, Greek, and Sanscrit by d, and in German by s or z. Thus Eng. tooth (for tont) = Lat. dens (genit. dentis), Gr. odous (genit. odontos), Sansc. dant, Ger. zahn, O. H. Ger. zand; Eng. heart = Lat. cor (genit. cordis), Gr. kardia, Sansc. kridaya, Ger. herza; Eng. eat = Lat. edo, Gr. edō, Sansc. ad, O. H. Ger. ēzan, Ger. ersen. If the tis preceded by s, this rule does not apply, as in Eng. stand = Lat. sto, Gr. histēmi, Ger. stehen. Th in English, &c., is represented in Latin, Greek, and Sanscrit by t, and in German by d; thus, Eng. thou = Lat. tu, Gr. tu, Sansc. tvam, Ger. du; Eng. three = Lat. tres, Gr. treis, Sansc. tri, O. H. Ger. dri, Ger. drei. In a few instances t in English represents an l in Latin, as in tear (s.) = Lat. lacrima. In bat and mate, t supplies the place of an original k (O. Eng. bak and make). An original t is sometimes represented by d in English; cf. proud = O. Eng. prut; diamond = Fr. diamant; card = Fr. carte, Lat. charta. An original t has become th in author = Lat. auctor. It has disappeared from the middle of a word in best = O. Eng. betst; last = O. Eng. latst; from the end of a word in anvil = O. Eng. anfilt; petty = Fr. petit; dandelion = Fr. dent de lion. T has crept in (1) after s, as in behest, amongst, against, amidst, whilst, betwixt; (2) in tyrant = O. Fr. tiran, Lat. tyrannus; parchment = O. Fr. parchemin; cormorant = Fr. cormoran; ancient = Fr. ancien; pheasant = O. Fr. phasian. Th represents an original d in hither, thither, whether, faith = O. Fr. feid, Lat. fides. An original th has become d in could = O. Eng. cuthe; fiddle = O. Eng. fithle; Bedlam = Bethlehem; it has become t in theft = A. S. theofth; nostril = A. S. nasthyrlu; it has disappeared from Norfolk = North-folk; worship = A. S. weorthscipe. T is often doubled in the middle of words, occasionally at the end, as in butt, mitt. T is often used to denote things of the shape of the capital letter; cf. T-bandage, T-square, &c.

T, as a symbol, is used in numerals for 160, and with a stroke over it (T̄) for 160,000.

¶ (1) Marked with a t: A thief. An expression equivalent to the trium literarum homo of Plautus (Aul., II. iv. 47). The English phrase derives its force from the fact that thieves were formerly branded in the hand with the letter T.

(2) To a t: Exactly; to a nicety; with the utmost exactness; as, That fits me to a t.

tāb, s. [Etym. doubtful.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. A latchet or flap of a shoe or half-boot, formerly fastened with a buckle, now usually by a string.

2. The metallic binding on the end of a shoe or corset lace; a tag.

3. A lace or other border, resembling that of a cap, sometimes worn on the inner front edges of ladies' bonnets.

4. The hanging sleeve of a child's garment.

II. Fulling: One of the revolving arms which lift the beaters of a fulling-machine.

tāb'-ard, tāb'-ērd, tāb'-ērt, tāb'-ēld, s. [O. Fr. tabart, tabard; Fr. tabard; Sp. & Port. tabardo; Ital. tabarro; Wel. tabar; M. H. Ger. tapfart, taphart. Origin unknown.] A light vestment worn over the armor, and generally embroidered with the arms of the wearer. It was close-fitting, open at the sides, with wide sleeves or flaps reaching to the elbows. It originally reached to the middle of the leg, and was afterward made shorter. It was at first worn chiefly by the military, but afterward became an ordinary article of dress of other classes in England and France, in the middle ages. The illustration shows the tabard and other official dress of Garter King of Arms, in 1417, when the office was created by Henry V. for the service of the Order of the Garter, which till then had been attended by Windsor heralds. The tabard is now worn only by heralds and pursuivants at arms, and is embroidered with the arms of the sovereign.

Tabard.

tāb-ār-dar, tāb'-ard-ēr, tāb-ard-eēr, subst. [Eng. tabard; -er.] One who wears a tabard; specif., a scholar belonging to the foundation of Queen's College, Oxford University, England, whose original dress was a tabard.

tāb'-ar-ēt, subst. [Etym. doubtful; perhaps connected with tabby (q. v.).]

tāb-ā-sheēr, s. [From the Persian.]

Min.: A hydrated silica, belonging to the Opal group, deposited in irregular masses about the joints of certain varieties of the bamboo. Color, yellowish white; fracture, somewhat resinous; translucent to opaque. Adheres strongly to the tongue. Resembles hydrophane (q. v.), when immersed in water becoming quite transparent. Very brittle.

tāb'-bled, pa. par. or a. [TABBY, v.]

tāb'-bīn-ēt, s. [TABINET.]

tāb'-bŷ, a. & subst. [Fr. tabis, from Sp. tabi = a silken stuff, from Arab. utābt = a kind of rich undulated silk.]

A. As adjective:

1. Having a wavy or watered appearance.

"The potent warriors of the tabby vest."

Parnell: Battle of Frogs and Mice, i.

2. Brindled, brinded; diversified in color.

"The cat, if you but singe her tabby skin,
The chimney keeps, and sits content within."

Pope: Wife of Bath, 142.

B. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Silk or other stuff having an irregularly waved or watered surface produced by pressure, usually between engraved rollers in the mode of calendaring, known as tabbying. There is but little difference between tabbying, watering, and moiré, the effect in each case being produced by the flattening of some of the fibers while the others remain undisturbed, causing the different parts to reflect the light unequally.

"In mimic pride the snail-wrought tissue shines Perchance of tabby or of harateen."

Swift. (Todd.)

2. A mixture of lime with shells, gravel, or stones in equal proportions, forming a mass which, when dry, becomes as hard as rock. It is used in Morocco as a substitute for brick or stone in building. (Weale.)

3. A cat of a mixed or brindled kind; a cat generally. (Collog.)

"As in her ancient mistress' lap
The youthful tabby lay."

Cowper: Familiarity Dangerous.

4. An old maiden lady; an old spinster; a gossip. (Collog.)

"I am much sorry for the coming in of these old tabbies, and am not obliged to her ladyship for leaving us to such an agreeable tête-à-tête." — G. Colman the Elder: Jealous Wife, ii. 3.

II. Entom.: A common European moth, Aglossa pinguinalis, one of the Pyralites; grayish-brown, clouded with a darker color; hind wings grayish-brown; larva seen on greasy horse-cloths, &c. The Small Tabby is Aglossa cuprealis, and has the hind wings whitish. It is rarer.

tabby-cat, s. A brindled cat; a tabby.

tāb'-bŷ, v. t. [TABBY, a.] To calender so as to give a tabby or wavy appearance to, as stuffs; to water or cause to look wavy; as, to tabby silk, mohair, &c. It is done by a calender without water.

tāb'-bŷ-ing, s. [TABBY, v.]

Fabric: The act or process of passing fabrics between engraved rollers to impart a wavy or watered appearance.

tābe, s. [Lat. tabes.] A wasting away; tabes.

"A tabe and a consumption." — Adams: Works, i. 191.

tā-bē-fāc'-tion, s. [Lat. tabefactio.] [TABEFY.] The act or state of wasting away.

tā-bē-fŷ, tāb'-ē-fŷ, v. t. [Lat. tabefio, from tabes=wasting away, and facio=to make.] To waste away; to cause to waste or consume away; to emaciate.

"Meat eaten in greater quantity than is convenient tabefies the body." — Harvey: On Consumptions.

tā-bēl'-lŷ-ōn, s. [Lat. tabellio, from tabella=a tablet, dimin. from tabula=a table (q. v.).] A kind of secretary or notary; a scrivener. (Such a functionary existed under the Roman Empire, and during the old monarchy in France.)

tā-bēr, v. i. [TABOR, v.]

tāb'-ērd, s. [TABARD.]

tā-bērg-ite, s. [After Taberg, Sweden, where found; suff. -ite. (Min.)]

Min.: A variety of the chlorite group of minerals, which has been referred by different mineralogists both to penninite and clinocllore (Dana's ripidolite). Color, bluish green. From optical observations Des Cloizeaux states that it sometimes consists of uniaxial and biaxial laminae combined, the axial divergence varying as much as from 1° to 33°, thus indicating a mixture of the members of this group.

tāb'-ēr-n, s. [Lat. taberna=a tavern.] A cellar. (Prov.)

tāb'-ēr-nāc-le (le as el), s. & a. [Fr., from Lat. tabernaculum, a double dimin. from taberna=a hut, a shed; Sp. & Port. tabernaculo; Ital. tabernacolo.] [TAVERN.]

A. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

*1. Lit.: A slightly-constructed temporary building or habitation; a tent, a pavilion.

"The Emperor had caused to be made a certain pavilion or tabernacle eight square." — P. Holland: Plutarch, p. 107.

2. Figuratively:

(1) A temple; a place of worship; a sacred place; specifically, the sacred tent built by Moses and maintained as the central place of worship for Israel until Solomon built the temple.

"Lord, who shall abide in thy tabernacle? who shall dwell in thy holy hill?" — Psalm xv. 1.

*(2) The human frame as the temporary abode of the soul.

"I think it meet, as long as I am in this tabernacle to stir you up by putting you in remembrance; knowing that shortly I must put off this my tabernacle, even as our Lord Jesus Christ hath shewed me." — 2 Peter i. 13, 14.

II. Technically:

1. Jewish Antiq.: Heb. mishkan=a dwelling; ochel=a tent, more fully denominated Tabernacle of the Congregation, and Tabernacle of Witness, a tent constructed by direction of Moses, under divine authority, to be a local habitation for Jehovah while His people moved from place to place in the wilderness—a temple being obviously unsuitable to the period of the wandering. To obtain materials for the construction of this sacred tent free-will offerings were solicited, and the Jews, in response, brought gold, silver, "brass" (copper), cloths, rams' skins dyed red, oil, spices, precious stones, &c. (Exod. xxv. 1-9; xxxvi. 1-5.) Bezaleel and Aholiab, men divinely endowed with genius for the purpose, were the actual builders (xxxv. 30-34; xxxvi. 4). The tabernacle was 30 cubits (i. e., 45 feet) long, 10 cubits (15 feet) wide, and 10 cubits (15 feet) high. The material was "shittim" (acacia) wood, 20 boards of which, standing upright, constituted each of the longer (i. e., the north and south) sides, and six the west one, while the east end was open. Each board was fastened below by tenons fitting into two silver sockets; they were held in their places by five bars of acacia wood on each side and five at the end, passing horizontally through rings of gold fastened in the upright boards. The interior was divided into an outer room 20 cubits long by 10 broad, called the Holy Place, or Sanctuary, and an inner apartment 10 cubits (15 feet) long by 10 broad, named the Most Holy Place, or Holy of Holies. At the east, or open end, were five pillars of acacia wood, overlaid with gold, supporting a veil or curtain of fine linen with needlework of blue, crimson, and scarlet. Each pillar stood on a brass socket and was furnished with golden hooks. Between the Holy Place and the Place Most Holy was another veil or curtain of the same material as the first, but the pillars supporting it rested on silver sockets. Four different kinds of curtains or coverings supplied the place of a roof. The first, or inner one, of the same material as the two vails, was of ten curtains, each 28 cubits (42 feet) long by 20 cubits (30 feet) broad. The covering exterior to this was of fine goats' hair, then there was one of sheep skins dyed red, then one of tachhash, rendered in the text of the Revised Version seal skins, and in the margin porpoise skins. Within the Holy Place, on the north side, was the golden table with the shew-bread on it, and on the south side the golden candlestick, and the golden altar of incense. In the Holy of Holies were the Ark of the Covenant and the mercy-seat (Exod. xxvi. 1-37; xxxvi. 1-38; Heb. ix. 1-5). Around the tabernacle was the court of the tabernacle, 100 cubits (150 feet) long, by 50 cubits (75 feet) broad, surrounded by sixty pillars, each five cubits (7½ feet) high, with silver capitals and hooks, and brass sockets. The four pillars in the eastern side supported a veil or curtain constituting the gate of the court. The brazen altar and the laver were in the courtyard. Around the latter were the tents of the Levites, and beyond these those of the other tribes, three on each side of the tabernacle. Only the priests entered the Holy Place. This they did twice daily, in the morning to extinguish the lights, in the evening to light them anew. None but the high priest could enter the Holy of Holies, and he only once a year, on the great day of Atonement. The Gershonites, the Merarites, and the Kohathites took charge of the tabernacle and its furniture when these were removed from place to place. The tabernacle was first set up by Moses on the first day of the second year after the Israelites had left Egypt. After they had reached Canaan it was located at Shiloh (1 Sam. iv. 3-22.) In Saul's time it was at Nob (cf. 1 Sam. xxi. 1 and Mark ii. 26.) When Solomon became king it was at Gibeon (1 Kings iii. 4). Afterward Solomon laid it up in the Temple, of which in all its leading features it had been the model (1 Kings viii. 4, 2 Chron. v. 5). [TEMPLE, s., ¶.]

2. Eccles. & Church Hist.: In the Roman Church, a receptacle for the consecrated Host for benediction and the ciborium containing the smaller Hosts which the laity receive. In its present form—a small structure of marble, metal, or wood, placed in the center of the east side of the altar—the tabernacle dates from the sixteenth century. Its original form was that of a dove; about the middle of the fourteenth century it was sometimes placed in an aumbry above the altar. A lamp constantly burns before the tabernacle, which is kept locked, the key never passing out of the charge of the clergy. The name tabernacle is also given to (1) a niche for an image, (2) a reliquary, (3) the aumbry near the high altar when used to contain the reserved sacrament, and (4) the abbot's stall in choir.

3. Naut.: An elevated socket for a boat's mast, or a projecting post to which a mast may be hinged when it is fitted for lowering to pass beneath bridges.

*B. As adj.: The same as TABERNACULAR (q. v.).

¶ Feast of Tabernacles:

Jewish Antiq.: Chag hassukkoth, one of the three leading Jewish feasts, on the recurrence of which all the males were required to present themselves at Jerusalem. During this feast the people dwelt on their housetops or elsewhere in booths made of the branches of trees, in commemoration of their tent life in the wilderness. Called also the Feast of Ingathering, because it was a feast of thanksgiving for the completion of the harvest and the vintage. It lasted for eight days, from the 15th to the 23d of Tisri, corresponding to October. The first and the eighth days were holy convocations (Exod. xxiii. 16; Lev. xxiii. 34; Num. xxix. 12; Deut. xvi. 13). It is believed that the eighth day of the Feast of Tabernacles was the last great day of the feast at which Jesus preached (John vii. 37).

tabernacle-work, s.

Eccles.: Carved canopy-work over a pulpit, a choir stall, or a niche. The example figured is from the Lady Chapel, Exeter Cathedral.

Tabernacle-work.

tāb'-ēr-nāc-le (le as ēl), v. i. [TABERNACLE, s.] To sojourn; to dwell for a time; to house.

"He assumed our nature, and tabernacled amongst us in the flesh."—Scott: Works (ed. 1718), ii. 467.

tāb'-ēr-nāc'-u-lar, a. [Lat. tabernacul(um) = a tabernacle; Eng. adj. suff. -ar.]

1. Sculptured with delicate tracery or open-worked; latticed.

2. Of or pertaining to a tabernacle.

*3. Of or pertaining to a booth or shop; hence, common, low. (De Quincey.) tā-bēr-nā-mōn-tā-nā, s. [Named by Plumier, after James Theodore Tabernemontanus, who in 1588 published the first part of a great Herbal. He died in 1590.]

Bot.: A genus of Plumieræ. Flowers monopetalous, corolla salver-shaped; stamens five, included; anthers sagittate; style filiform; stigma dilated at the base, trifid; ovaries two, developing into two follicles; seeds immersed in deep-red pulp. Tabernemontana utilis, the Hya-hya of Demerara, is one of the Cow-trees. It pours forth a copious stream of thick, sweet, innoxious milk. T. coronaria is a small evergreen shrub, six or eight feet high, with silvery bark and glossy leaves. It is common in India gardens; its native country is unknown. The red pulp obtained from the aril is used as a dye by the hill people. An oil is prepared from T. dichotoma, a small Indian tree. The Ceylonese suppose its fruit to have been the forbidden fruit of paradise. The sap of T. persicariaefolia, found in Mauritius, is considered poisonous; its wood is used in turnery.

tā'-bēs, s. [Lat., from tabeo=to waste away.]

Pathol.: A wasting away of the body, however produced. It figured largely in the older writers, but is now limited to the three compounds subjoined.

†tabes-dorsalis, s.

Pathol.: The same as LOCOMOTOR-ATAXY (q. v.).

Pathol.: [STRUMA, 2.]

tabes-mesenterica, s. [MESENTERIC-DISEASE.]

tā-bēt'-ic, a. [TABES.]

1. Of or pertaining to tabes; of the nature of tabes.

2. Affected with or suffering from tabes.

tāb'-id-nēss, subst. [Eng. tabid; -ness.] The quality or state of being tabid or wasted by disease; emaciation, tabes.

"Profuse sweatings in the night, a tabidness of the flesh, hot and cold fits alternately succeeding."—Leigh: Nat. Hist. Lancashire, p. 62.

tā-bīf'-ic, a. [Lat. tabes=a wasting away, and facio=to make.] Causing consumption or wasting away; wasting.

tāb'-in-ēt, tāb'-bīn-ēt, s. [Etym. doubtful; by some referred to tabby (q. v.); according to Trench, named after a M. Tabinet, a French Protestant refugee, who introduced the making of tabinet into Dublin.]

Fabric:

1. A kind of taffety or tabby.

2. A mixed stuff of silk and wool, adapted for window-curtains.

tāb'-i-tūde, s. [Lat. tabitudo, from tabes.] The state of one affected with tabes.

tāb'-lā, s. [Peruvian.]

Pharm.: Cinchona bark peeled from the trunk of the tree. It is more valuable than that derived from the branches.

tāb'-lā-ture, s. [Fr., from Lat. tabula=a board, a table.]

1. Anat.: A division or parting of the skull into two tables.

2. Art.: A painting on a wall or ceiling.

"In painting we may give to any particular work the name of tablature, when the work is in reality a single piece, comprehended in one view, and formed according to one single intelligence, meaning, or design."—Lord Shaftesbury.

3. Music:

(1) A general name for all the signs and characters used in music. Those who were well acquainted with these signs were said to sing by the Tablature.

(2) A peculiar system of notation employed for instruments of the lute class, for viols, and certain wind instruments. The earliest systems of notation, like the music of Asiatic nations to this day, were different sorts of tablature. That which may be called the modern tablature was invented not earlier than the sixteenth century. In England tablature was employed for all stringed instruments, the number of lines employed being regulated by the number of strings the instrument possessed. Tablature for wind instruments was expressed by dots on a stave of six, seven, or eight lines, according to the number of holes in the instrument, the number of dots signifying the number of holes to be stopped by the fingers. Organ tablature was a system of writing the notes without the stave by means of letters.

Tablature.

Thus, the several octaves were called great, little, one and two-line octaves, according to the style of letter employed to indicate them. The name has also been applied to figured bass. The illustration given is from the French and English tablature employed by John Dowland in his Books of Songes or Ayres (London, 1597-1603), and by most English lutenists.

"Well, those who affirm that these devices agree not to the minde of Plato, are yet of opinion, that those other agree very well to the propositions described in the tablature of musicians, which consisteth of five tetra-chords."—P. Holland: Plutarch, p. 857.

tā'-ble, s. & a. [Fr., from Lat. tabula=a plank, a flat board, a table, from a root ta- or tan-=to stretch. From the same root comes thin (q. v.). Sp. tabla; Port. taboa; Ital. tavola; Dut. & Ger. tafel.]

A. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

*1. A flat surface of some extent; a flat, smooth piece; a slab.

"Upon the castle hill there is a bagnio with fair tables of marble."—Sandys.

*2. A surface flat and smooth to be painted on.

*3. Hence a painting, a drawing.

"The table wherein Detraction was expressed, he [Apelles] painted in this form."—Elyot: The Governor, bk. iii, ch. xxvii.

¶ A "painted table" was the common mode of designating a picture painted on wood, after the usual manner of mediæval artists, in inventories of the period.

"His order was when he had finished a peece of worke or painted table, and laid it out of his hand, to set it forth in some open gallerie or thorow fare to be seene of folke that passed by, and himselfe would lie close behind it to hearken what faults were found therewith."—P. Holland: Pliny, bk. xxxv, ch. ix.

*4. A thin piece of something for writing on; a tablet.

"Written . . . not on tables of stone, but on fleshly tables of the heart."—2 Corinth. iii. 3.

*5. Hence, in plural, a memorandum book, a note-book.

"His master's old tables, his note-book, his counsel-keeper."—Shakesp.: Henry IV., Pt. II., ii. 4.

6. An article of furniture, consisting of a flat surface or top of boards or other materials, supported on legs, and used for a great variety of purposes, as for supporting dishes, work, articles of ornament, &c., writing upon, or the like. Tables are distinguished according to size, shape, construction, material, purpose, &c.; as a dining-table, a billiard-table, a folding-table, a toilet-table, &c.

"Yea, many a man, perdie, I could unmask, Whose desk and table make a solemn show."

Thomson: Castle of Indolence, i. 56.

7. The persons seated at table or partaking of entertainment.

"To set the table on a roar."—Shakesp.: Hamlet, v. 1.

8. Fare or entertainment provided for guests.

"Nothing could be in better taste than his equipages and his table."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xiv.

*9. (Pl.): The game of backgammon or draughts.

"Monsieur the nice,

When he plays at tables, chides the dice."

Shakesp.: Love's Labor's Lost, v. 2.

10. A presentation of many items or particulars in one connected group; especially when the items are in lists or columns; a collection of heads or principal matters in a book, with references to the pages where they may be found; an index.

"It might seem impertinent to have added a table to a book of so small a volume, and which seems to be itself but a table; but it may prove advantageous at once to learn the whole culture of any plant."—Evelyn: Kalendar.

11. (Pl.): A list in columns of the results of the multiplication of numbers in regular order by others, given to children to teach them arithmetical multiplication; as, A child learns his tables. (Colloq.)

II. Technically:

1. Anat. (pl.): Two layers of compact, bony substance, the outer and inner tables separated by an intervening canceled substance called diploë. (Quain.)

2. Architecture:

(1) A smooth, simple member or ornament of various forms, but most usually in that of a long square. When it projects from the naked of the wall it is termed a raised or projecting table; when it is not perpendicular to the surface it is called a raking-table; and when the surface is roughed, frosted, or vermiculated it is called a rustic table. (Gwilt.)

(2) A horizontal molding on the exterior or interior face of a wall, placed at different levels, fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camel, hēr, thēre; pīne, pīt, sīre, sīr, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rāle, fūll; trȳ, Sȳrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

which form basements, separate the stories of a building, and crown its upper portions; a string-course. (Oxford Glossary.)

3. Eccles.: The Communion table (q. v.). In the Prayer Book the expressions, Holy Table, the Lord's Table, occur, but in the Coronation Service the word Altar is used.

4. Glass-making:

(1) The flat disk of crown glass which is made from a bulb on the end of a blowing-tube, transferred to a ponty, gradually and finally flashed into a disk by rotating in front of a flashing-furnace (q. v.). It is usually about four feet in diameter. Twenty-four tables make a case.

(2) The flat plate with a raised rim, on which plate-glass is formed.

5. Lapidary:

(1) Table-cutting; a form of diamond-cutting. The top of the stone is ground flat with a corresponding flat bottom of less area, with its four upper and lower facets cut parallel to each other.

(2) The upper flat surface of a brilliant cut diamond.

6. Mach.: The part on which work is placed to be operated upon.

7. Math., Nat. Philos., &c.: An arranged collection of many particulars, data, or values; a system of numbers calculated for expediting operations or for exhibiting the measures or values of some property common to a number of different bodies in reference to some common standard; a series of numbers which proceed according to some given law expressed by a formula. Thus there are tables of logarithms, of rhumbs, of specific gravity, of square or cube-roots, of aberration, &c.

*8. Palmistry: The collection of lines on the palm of the hand.

"Mistress of a fairer table Hath not history nor fable."

Ben Jonson: Masque of Gipsies.

9. Perspective: The same as PERSPECTIVE-PLANE (q. v.).

10. Weaving: The board or bar in a draw-loom to which the tails of the harness are attached.

B. As adj.: Appertaining to, provided or necessary for, or used at table; as, table linen.

¶ (1) Lord's table: The sacrament of the Lord's Supper or holy communion.

(2) Round table: [ROUND, a.]

(3) Table of Pythagoras: The common multiplication-table carried up to ten.

(4) Tables of the Law, Tables of the Testimony:

Jewish Antiq.: Two tables of stone, written or inscribed on both sides; "and the tables were the work of God, and the writing was the writing of God graven upon the tables" (Exod. xxxii. 16); "written with the finger of God" (xxxi. 18). After having received them from Jehovah, high on the ridge or peak of Sinai, Moses was carrying them down the mountain-side to the camp, when he was so overcome by passion on hearing the shouts raised by the people in connection with idol-worship that he flung from him the tables of stone, which broke on the ground (17-19). They were divinely replaced by others (xxxiv 1-29), which were put in the ark (Deut. x 5). The writing on the tables consisted of the Ten Commandments, probably the first four teaching duty to God, on the first table, and the other six, telling of duty to man, on the second table (Matt. xxii. 36-39).

* (5) Tables Toletanes: The Alphonsine astronomical tables, so called from their being adapted to the city of Toledo. (Chaucer: C. T., 11,585.)

(6) The Four Tables:

Scottish Church Hist.: An executive committee, consisting of four noblemen, four gentlemen, four ministers, and four burgesses, appointed in 1638 by the Presbyterians to manage their affairs during the struggle against the forcible introduction of the liturgy into the Scottish church. The name was given because the committee met in four separate rooms in Parliament House in Edinburgh, each room of course furnished with a separate table.

(7) To lay on the table: In parliamentary practice, and in the usage of corporate and other bodies, to receive any document, as a report, motion, or the like, but to agree to postpone its consideration indefinitely.

(8) To order (a bill or document) to lie on the table: To defer for future consideration; to postpone.

* (9) To serve tables:

Script.: To administer the alms of the Church. (Acts vi. 2.)

(10) To turn the tables. To change or reverse the condition or fortune of two contending parties; a metaphor taken from the vicissitudes of fortune at gaming-tables.

"The West countrymen being victorious, but the tables were turned in three following years."—London Daily News.

(11) Twelve Tables:

Roman Antiq.: The tables containing the body of Roman law drawn up by the decemvirs, B. C. 451: originally there were only ten of these tables, but two more were added in the following year.

table-anvil, subst. A small anvil adapted to be screwed to a table for bending plates of metal or wires, making small repairs, &c.

table-beer, s. Beer for the table or for common use; small beer.

table-bell, s. A small bell to be used at meals for calling servants.

1. A memorandum-book; a note-book.

"If I had played the desk or table-book."

Shakesp.: Hamlet, ii. 2.

2. A book containing the multiplication table, and tables of weights and measures.

table-cloth, subst. A cloth for covering a table, especially for spreading over the table previous to setting on the dishes, &c., for meals.

table-clothing, s. Table-linen. (Prov.)

table-cover, s. A cloth made of wool, cotton, or other fabric, either woven or stamped with a pattern, laid on a table between meal-times.

table-cutting, s. [TABLE, s., II. 5, (1).]

table-d'hôte, s. [Lit., the host's table; so called because it was formerly, and in Germany still is, the custom for the landlord to take the head of the table.] A common table for guests at an hotel; an ordinary.

Min.: A diamond prepared as a flat stone, with two opposite plane surfaces and beveled edges.

table-knife, s. An ordinary knife used at table, as distinguished from a fruit-knife, a penknife, &c.

Phys. Geog.: A plateau; a plain existing at some considerable elevation above the sea. Volcanic rocks often make such table-lands, as in Central India; so do limestones. Or a sea-bed or a lake-bed, or a great stretch of country, may be upheaved. The chief table-lands are in the Old World, extensive, low-lying plains rather than table-lands characterizing the New. One occupies about half the surface of Asia, being 5,500 miles from east to west, and from 700 to 2,000 miles from north to south. In Europe there are table-lands in parts of Switzerland, France, Spain, and Bavaria. African table-lands exist in Morocco, Abyssinia, the region of the Victoria Nyanza, &c. In North America there are plateaux along the Pacific, Labrador, &c., and in South America in Brazil and the adjacent countries.

"At sunrise we discovered a high table-land (an island) bearing E. by S.—Cook: Second Voyage, bk. iii., ch. iv.

table-lathe, s. A hand-lathe (q. v.).

table-sport, s. The object of sport at table; a butt. (Shakesp.: Merry Wives, iv. 2.)

table steam-engine, s. A form of engine in which the cylinder is fixed upon a table-like base.

table-talk, s. Conversation at table or at meals; familiar conversation.

"His fate makes table-talk, divulged with scorn."

Dryden: Juvenal, sat. ii.

table-talker, s. A conversationalist; one who studies to lead or outshine others in table-talk.

table-turning, s. One of the earliest of the manifestations said to be produced by spiritual agency. A number of persons formed a circle round a table, on which their outstretched fingers lightly rested. After a time the table began to move, and to answer questions either by tilting or rapping at appropriate letters as the alphabet was repeated. The late Professor Faraday was of opinion that a rotary impulse was unconsciously imparted to the table by those who stood round it, and it has been pointed out that pushing may take place without any distinct consciousness on the part of those who push, and that expectant attention is known to produce such a state of the muscles as would occasion this unconscious pushing.

Eccles.: A word formed in the fifteenth century to express the position in which some altars were then placed, i. e., in the body of the church, with their ends east and west.

tā'-ble, v. t. & i. [TABLE, s.]

tāb-lī-nūm, s. [Lat.]

Roman Antiq.: An apartment in a Roman house in the center of the atrium, in which were deposited the genealogical records and archives, and all documents commemorating the exploits which had been performed by members of the family, or which were connected with the high offices which any of them had filled.

tā-boō', tā-bū', *tā-pū', s. [South-Sea tabu; Maori tapu=sacred.]

1. Lit. & Anthropol.: A custom formerly very prevalent in Polynesia and New Zealand of separating persons, places, or things from common use; applied also to the state or condition of being so separated. The taboo was essentially a religious ceremony, and could only be imposed by the priest, though it was employed in social and political affairs, as well as in matters distinctly religious. The idols, temples, persons and names of the king were taboo (or sacred), and almost everything offered in sacrifice was taboo to the use of the gods. Seasons of taboo (on the approach of some festival, before going to war, and in case of the illness of a chief), were either common or strict. During the former, the men were only required to abstain from their ordinary pursuits, and attend a religious ceremony morning and evening; during the latter, all fires and lights were extinguished, and no person, except those whose attendance was required at the temple was allowed out of doors. The taboo was imposed either by proclamation or by fixing certain marks to the places or things tabooed. The prohibitions and requisitions of the taboo were strictly enforced, and every breach of them punished with death, unless the delinquent had powerful friends who were either priests or chiefs. The king, sacred chiefs and priests seem to have been the only persons to whom the application of the taboo was easy; the great mass of the people were at no period of their existence free from its influence, and no circumstance in life could excuse disobedience to its commands, while, like many of the peculiar customs of lower races, it bore with peculiar hardship on women. A girl was not allowed to eat food that had been cooked at her father's fire, and a wife was forbidden to partake of what she had prepared for her husband and sons, and even to eat in the same room with them. In New Zealand, however, the custom was, in its influence, generally more powerful for good than for evil. The advance of civilization and the influence of the missionaries have done much to abolish it throughout the South Sea Islands, and even where it still lingers the old death penalty for its violation can be no longer enforced.

2. Fig.: Prohibition of social intercourse with.

tā-boō', tā-bū', v. t. [TABOO, s.]

1. Lit.: To put under taboo.

"Sometimes an island or a district was tabued, when no canoe or person was allowed to approach it."—Browne: Peoples of the World, ii. 48.

2. Fig.: To forbid the use of; to interdict approach to, or contact or intercourse with, as for religious or other reasons.

"Art and poetry were tabooed both by my rank and my mother's sectarianism."—Kinsley: Alton Locke, ch. i.

tā'-bōr, *tā'-bōur, s. [O. Fr. tabour (Fr. tambour), from Sp. tambor, atambor, from Arab. tambūr=a kind of lute, a guitar with a long neck and six brass strings; also a drum; Pers. tumbuk=a trumpet, a bag-pipe; tambal=a small drum; tabir=a drum; Ital. tamburo.]

Mus.: A small shallow drum used to accompany the pipe and beaten by the fingers. The old English tabor was hung round the neck, and beaten with a stick held in the right hand, while the left hand was occupied in fingering a pipe. The pipe and tabor were the ordinary accompaniment of the morris-dance. The illustration is taken from the celebrated ancient window in the mansion of Geo. Tollet, Esq., Batley, Staffordshire. (See Hone's Year Book, July 17.)

"Dost thou live by thy tabor?"—Shakesp.: Twelfth Night, iii. 1.

tā'-bōr, *tā'-bōur, v. i. & t. [TABOR, s.]

A. Intransitive:

1. To play upon the tabor.

2. To strike lightly and frequently.

1. A tabor; a small drum in form of a sieve; a tambourine.

2. A side-drum.

"Trumpeters . . .

Make mingle with our rattling tabourines."

Shakesp.: Antony and Cleopatra, iv. 1.

Tā'-bōr-ītes, s. pl. [Bohem. tabor=a tent.]

Church History: A section of Calixtines, who received their name from a great encampment organized by them on a mountain near Prague in 1419, for the purpose of receiving the Communion in both kinds. On the same spot they founded the city of Tabor, and, assembling an insurrectionary force, marched on Prague under the lead of Ziska (July 30, 1419), and committed great atrocities under the pretense of avenging insults offered to the Calixtine custom of communicating under both kinds. On the death of King Wenceslaus (Aug. 16, 1419) they began to destroy churches and monasteries, to persecute the clergy, and to appropriate church property on the ground that Christ was shortly to appear and establish his personal reign among them. They were eventually conquered and dispersed in 1453 by George Podiebrada (afterward King of Bohemia).

tā'-bōur-ēt, s. [TABORET.]

1. A taboret.

"They shall depart the manor before him with trumpets, tabourets, and other minstrelsy."—Spectator.

*tā'-brēre, subst. [Eng. tabor; -er.] A player on the tabor.

"I saw a shole of shepherds outgo,

Before them yode a lusty tabrere."

Spenser: Shepherd's Calendar; June.

tā'-brēt, s. [Eng. tabor; -et.] A small tabor; a taboret.

Tabor and Tabor-stick.

tāb'-ū-lā (pl. tāb'-ū-læ), s. [Lat.]

*1. Ord. Lang.: A table; a flat surface.

2. Zool. (pl.): Transverse partitions in certain corals; horizontal plates or floors, extending from side to side across the cavity of some corals, which they divide into chambers, one above another.

tabula rasa, phrase. [Lat.=A smooth waxed tablet, ready to receive any impression of the style.]

Philos.: A term used by the Sensational philosophers of the seventeenth century to describe the condition of the human mind before it has been the subject of experience, in opposition to the supporters of the theory of innate ideas. The origin of the expression is probably to be found in Aristotle (de Anima, lih. iii., c. iv., § 14.)

tāb'-ū-lar, a. [Lat. tabularis, from tabula=a table.]

1. In the form of a table; having a flat surface.

2. Formed in laminae or plates.

"All the nodules that consist of one uniform substance were formed from one point, except those that are tabular and plated."—Woodward: On Fossils.

3. Set down in or forming a table, list or schedule; as, a tabular statement.

4. Derived from or computed by the use of tables as, tabular right ascension.

tabular-bone, s.

Anat. (pl.): Flat bones, as the scapula, the ilium, and the bones forming the roof and sides of the skull.

tubular-crystal, subst. A crystal in which the prism is very short.

tabular-differences, s. pl. In logarithmic tables of numbers, a column of numbers marked D, consisting of the differences of the logarithms taken in succession, each number being the difference between the successive logarithms in the same line with it. When the difference is not the same between all the logarithms in the same line, the number which answers most nearly to it, one part taken with another, is inserted. In the common table of logarithms the logarithms of all the numbers from 1 to 10,000 can be found by inspection, but by the aid of the tabular differences the logarithms of numbers between 10,000 and 1,000,000 may be found. Also by the aid of the same differences the number corresponding to any logarithm can be found to five or six places. In logarithmic tables of sines, tangents, secants, cosines, cotangents, and cosecants there are three columns of tabular differences on each page. The first of these is placed between the sines and cosecants, the second between the tangents and cotangents, and the third between the secants and cosines. These numbers are the differences between the logarithms on the left hand against which they are placed and the next lower increased in the proportion of 100 to 60. The use of these differences is to facilitate the finding of the logarithmic sine, tangent, secant, &c., for any given degrees, minutes, and seconds, or the degrees, minutes, and seconds corresponding to any given logarithmic sine, tangent, secant, &c.

tabular-spar, table-spar, s.

Min.: The same as WOLLASTONITE (q. v.).

tabular-structure, s.

Geol. & Petrol.: A structure suggestive of a table or a series of tables, i. e., the structure of a rock, flat above, and with vertical seams or fissures.

tāb'-ū-lar-ī-zā'-tion, s. [English tabulariz(e); -ation.] The act of tabulating or forming into tables; tabulation.

tāb'-ū-lar-ize, v. t. [Eng. tabular; -ize.] To form into tables; to reduce to a tabular form; to tabulate.

tāb'-ū-lar-ly, adv. [Eng. tabular; -ly.] In tabular form; by means of a list or schedule.

"To set forth as much as possible tabularly or concisely those features."—Lindsay: Mind in the Lower Animals, i. 69.

tāb'-ū-lā'-tā, s. pl. [Neut. pl. of Lat. tabulatus=boarded, floored, from tabula (q. v.).]

Zoölogy & Palæont.: A group of Madreporaria Perforata. Tabulate corals, having the visceral chamber divided into stories by tabulae, and with the septa rudimentary or absent. The group is of doubtful stability, some recent genera, as Millepora, Heliopora, &c., having been removed from it, and various fossil genera Favosites, Chætetes, Syringopora, Halysites, &c., being placed in it provisionally. Families Favositidae, Chætetidae, Thecidæ, and Halysitidae. From the Silurian onward.

tāb'-ū-lāte, a. [Mod. Lat. tabulatus, pa. par. of tabulo=to form into a table; Lat. tabula=a table.] Table-shaped, tabulated; specif., of or pertaining to the Tabulata (q. v.).

tabulate-corals, s. pl. [TABULATA.]

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camēl, hēr, thēre; pīne, pīt, sīre, sīr, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unīte, cūr, rūle, fūll; trȳ, Sȳrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

tăb'-u-late, v. t. [TABULATE, a.]

1. To reduce to tables; to make tables of.

"Dispose, tabulate, and calculate scattered ranks of numbers, and easily compute them."—Barrow: Mathematical Lectures. (Pref., p. 29.)

*2. To shape with a flat surface.

"Many of the best diamonds are pointed with six angles, and some tabulated or plain, and square."—Grew: Muscum.

tăb-u-lă-tion, s. [TABULATE, v.] The act, art, or process of forming tables or tabular statements; the act of reducing data to a tabular form; data reduced to a tabular form.

1. A resinous, balsamic, bitter, aromatic exudation, found in winter on the buds of Populus nigra, P. balsamifera, P. candicans, &c. It is said to be diuretic and antiscorbutic. It is made into an ointment for tumors, wounds, and burns, and constitutes the basis of a balsam and tincture used for colic, &c.

2. The resin of an amyrid, Elaphrium tomentosum, from the West Indies and Mexico.

3. The resin of Calophyllum calaba, from the East Indies.

4. A resin from the roots of Calophyllum inophyllum, from the Isle of Bourbon.

tăc'-ca, s. [Malay.]

Bot.: The typical genus of Taccaceæ (q. v.). Calyx six-partite; corolla six-parted; stamens six, inserted in the calyx; styles three; stigmas stellate. Berry hexangular, dry, many-seeded. In the Malay Peninsula and the Moluccas the tubers of Tacca pinnatifida, T. dubia, and T. montana are rasped and macerated in water, a fecula being extracted, which is eaten like sago. The first species is much grown in Travancore. The fecula which it yields is imported into other countries and used as a substitute for West-Indian arrowroot. It is called also T. youy. Its stalks are split and made into bonnets in the South Sea Islands. T. cristata is the water-lily of Singapore.

tăc-că'-ce-æ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. tacc(a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -aceæ.]

Bot.: Taccads, an order of Endogens, alliance Narcissales. Large perennial herbs with a tuberous root. Leaves radical, stalked, exstipulate, undivided or pedatifid, the segments pinnatifid and entire, with curved parallel veins. Flowers at the extremity of a scape, in umbels, surrounded by undivided bracts, constituting an involucre. Perianth six-cleft, the tube superior, the limb petaloid, equal or unequal; stamens six, persistent, with dilated filaments; styles three, connate; ovary of three carpels, with five parietal placentæ; many-seeded; fruit baccate, with lunate striated seeds. Known genera, two, species eight; found in damp forests, especially near the sea in tropical India, Africa, and the South Sea Islands.

tăc'-căd, s. [Mod. Lat. tacc(a); Eng. suff. -ad.]

Botany (pl.): Lindley's name for the Taccaceæ (q. v.).

ta'-cê (c as ch), v. i. [Ital., imperative sing. of tacere=to be silent.]

Music: A direction that a particular voice, instrument, or part is to be silent for a certain specified time.

tăc'-êş, s. pl. [TASSES.] Armor for the thighs.

tă'-çet, v. i. [Lat. 3d pers. sing. pres. indic. of taceo=to be silent.]

Music: The same as TACE (q. v.).

tăch, tăche (1), s. [A softened form of tack (q. v.).] Something used for taking hold or holding; an attachment; a catch, a loop, a button, or the like.

"Make fifty taches of gold, and couple the curtains together with the taches."—Exod. xxv. 6.

tăche (2), s. [Fr.] A pan in a battery of sugar-pans. The term is, however, often especially applied to the smallest of the five; that immediately over the fire, from which the concentrated juice is transferred to the cooler, also called the Striking-tache.

tăche (3), tacch, s. [Fr.] A spot, a stain, a blemish.

"The heryng or seinge of any vise or yvell tache."—Elyot: Governor, bk. i., ch. iii.

tăche, v. t. [TACHE (1), subst.] To attach, to fasten.

tăch-ě-ôg'-ra-pnŷ, s. [TACHYGRAPHY.]

tăch'-i-a, s. [Gu. nan tachi=an ant's nest. So named because the trunks and branches are generally full of ants.]

Bot.: A genus of Gentianeæ. Plants with yellow flowers, found in the West Indies, Guiana, &c.

tăch'-i-na, s. [TACHINUS.]

Entom.: The typical genus of Tachinariæ. One of the largest species is Tachina grossa, found in Europe. It is two-thirds of an inch long, black, and covered with bristles, the head and the base of the wings reddish yellow.

tăch'-i-năr'-i-æ, s. pl. [Mod. Latin tachin(a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -arice.]

Entom.: A group of Muscidæ. Bristles projecting from the third joint of the antennæ, either entirely naked or hairy, or plumose only at the base. Scales behind the base of the wings very large, entirely concealing the halteres. Flies with hairy bodies, moderately stout, and flying with great rapidity. The larvae feed as parasites upon caterpillars of the Lepidoptera and of sawflies, also on beetles, field bugs, earwigs, grasshoppers, bees, wasps, and spiders. They are abundant in all parts of the world.

tă-chin'-i-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Latin tachin(us); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Entom.: A family of Brachelytra, now merged in Staphylinidæ. Small, excessively agile beetles of convex tapering form, with pentamerous tarsi. They frequent flowers.

tăch'-i-nŷs, s. [Gr. tachinos, poetic for tachys=quick, swift.]

Entom.: A genus of Staphylinidæ, with antennæ thickening insensibly, and somewhat pear-shaped, the palpi filiform, the legs spinous.

tă-chôm'-ě-tēr, s. [Gr. tachos=speed, swiftness, and metron=a measure; Fr. tachomètre.] An instrument for measuring velocity; specifically—

(1) An instrument for measuring the velocity of machines by means of the depression occasioned in a column of fluid by centrifugal force, which causes the fluid in the cistern (with which the graduated column is connected) to ink in the center more and more with every increase of velocity. Thus the graduated column falls on the scale as the velocity is augmented, and rises as the velocity is diminished.

(2) An instrument for measuring the speed of flowing liquids. One form has several spiral vanes on a shaft carrying an endless screw, which turns a series of geared wheels. On being placed in a current, the vanes assume a position perpendicular thereto, and their rotation actuates the clock-work mechanism which is graduated to indicate the velocity of the liquid in miles per hour, or other units of measurement.

tăch'-ŷ, a. [Eng. tache (3); -y.] Vicious, corrupt.

"With no less furie in a throng Away these tachy humans flung."

Wit and Drollery.

tăch'-ŷ, pref. [Greek tachys=swift.] Attended with swiftness; endowed with speed.

tăch'-ŷ-a-phăl'-tite, s. [Pref. tachy-; Greek aphaltos=a springing off, and suff. -ite.]

Min.: An altered form of Zircon (q. v.), occurring in crystals in the gneiss of Krageroe, Norway. Decrepitates before the blowpipe, hence the name.

tac'-tile, a. [Fr., from Lat. tactilis, from tactus, pa. par. of tango=to touch.] Capable of being touched or of being perceived by the sense of touch.

"At this proud yielding word
She on the scene her tactile sweets presented."
Beaumont: Psyche.

tactile-corpuscule, s.

Anat. (pl.): One of the three kinds of sensory terminal organs. They were discovered by R. Wagner and Meissner. They are mostly of oval form, nearly one three-hundredth of an inch long, by one eight-hundredth thick. They have a core of soft homogeneous substance within, and a capsule of connective tissue with oblong transverse nuclei, like miniature fir cones, outside. They exist in certain papillæ in the skin of the hand and foot, on the fore-arm, and the nipple. Called also Touch bodies.

tactile-papillæ, s. pl.

Anat.: Papillæ bearing the tactile corpuscles (q. v.).

tactile-sensibility, s.

Physiol.: Sensibility of touch existing in different degrees in different parts of the skin.

tac-til'-i-tý, s. [Eng. tactil(e); -ity.]

1. The quality or state of being tactile or perceptible by the touch.

2. Touchiness.

"You have a little infirmity—tactility or touchiness."—S. Smith: Letters, 1831.

tact-in-vär'-i-ant, subst. [Eng. tact, and invariant.]

Alg.: The invariant which, equated to zero, expresses the condition that two quantic curves or surfaces touch each other.

tac'-tion, s. [Lat. tactio, from tactus, pa. par. of tango=to touch.]

*1. Ord. Lang.: The act or state of touching; touch.

"We neither seeing vision, nor feeling tacton, nor hearing audition, much less, hearing sight, or seeing taste, or the like."—Cudworth: Intel. System, p. 636.

tact'-less, a. [English tact; -less.] Destitute of tact.

tac'-tu-al, a. [Lat. tactus=touch.] Of or pertaining to the sense or organs of touch; consisting in or derived from touch.

"Whether visual or tactual, every perception of the space-attributes of body is decomposable into perceptions of relative position."—Herbert Spenser: Principles of Psychology, § 62.

tac'-û-a, s. [Native name (?).]

Entom.: A genus of Cicadidæ. The species are of large size, and common in tropical regions. The female of Tacua speciosa is more than three inches long.

tād, s. [Etym. unknown; probably from toad.] A humorous designation for a person; as, a little tād=a little boy or girl; an old tād=a gray-beard.

tāde, s. [TOAD.] (Scotch.)

tā-dor'-na, s. [Etym. doubtful.]

Ornith.: A genus of Anatidæ, with seven species, from the Palearctic and Australian regions. Beak about as long as the head, under mandible much narrower than upper, nail decurved, forming a hook, mandibles with transverse lamellæ; nasal groove near base of beak; nostrils, oval, lateral, pervious; legs moderate, tibia naked for a little above the tarsal joint; toes three in front entirely webbed, one behind free; wings of moderate length. The sexes are nearly alike in plumage.

tād'-pōle, s. [Eng. toad, and poll=head, i. e., the toad that seems all head.]

Biol.: The larva of the Anurous Amphibia, sometimes so far extended as to include larvæ of the Urodela, which undergo a much less complete metamorphosis. At first the young have no respiratory organs or limbs, but possess a tail, which is a powerful swimming organ. Branchial clefts soon develop, followed by ciliated external branchial plumes. The two pairs of limbs appear nearly simultaneously as small buds, the hinder pair at the junction of the tail and body, and the anterior pair concealed beneath the opercular membrane. The former are developed first, and when the gills are absorbed the latter appear; the tail then atrophies, and is completely absorbed, and the herbivorous gill-breathing tadpole becomes a lung-breathing carnivorous frog.

tadpole-fish, s. [TADPOLE-HAKE.]

tadpole-hake, s.

Ichthy.: Raniceps trifurcatus, from the coasts of northern Europe. It is a small fish, about twelve inches long, and of a darkish-brown color, somewhat rare, but occasionally taken on the Scottish coast, and round Devon and Cornwall. The head is disproportionately large and broad, a circumstance which has given rise to its popular name. Called also the Trifurcated Hake, Tommy Noddy, and the Lesser Fork-head.

*tād'-pōle-dōm, s. [Eng. tadpole; -dom.] The tadpole state.

"The little beggars, an inch long, fresh from water and tadpoledom."—C. Kingsley, in Life, ii. 157.

tā'en, pa. par. or a. [TAKEN.] (Scotch.)

tā'-nī-a, tē'-nī-a, s. [Lat., from Gr. tainia=a band, a ribbon; teinō=to stretch.]

1. Arch.: The band or fillet surmounting the Doric epistylum.

2. Surg.: A ligature; a long and narrow ribbon.

3. Zoöl.: Tapeworm; the typical genus of Tæniada (q. v.), consisting of internal parasitic worms, having an elongated, compressed, jointed body. The head is in general broader than the neck, with four suckorial depressions, and generally also a median retractile rostellum, frequently armed, especially when young, with one or two circles of minute recurved hooks. The genital organs at the margins of the joints, either on one side only or on both margins, and on alternate joints. The species, which are very numerous, Rudolphi admitting 146 and Dujardin 135, are most common in birds, next in mammalia, then in fishes, and lastly in reptiles. (Griffith & Henfrey.) Tænia solium is the Tapeworm (q. v.).

Anat.: A narrow white band prolonged from the fornix of the hippocampus major in the cerebrum. Called also corpus fimbriatum.

tænia semicircularis, s.

Anat.: A narrow flat band between the optic thalamus and the corpus striatum in the cerebrum.

tæ-nī-a-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat., from Lat. tænia=a tapeworm.]

Zoöl.: Cestoid worms; an order of Plathelmintha or Scolecida, containing the Tapeworms and Bladder-worms. Internal parasites, hermaphrodite when mature. The body is elongated, and consists of a head, with many flattened articulations. The small narrow head or scolex contains nearly all the organs of the body, and is essentially the animal, the articulations, called metameræ or proglottides, being generative segments thrown off by the head in the manner called budding or "gemination." Each reproductive joint contains both male and female organs. The joints nearest the head are the newest, those farthest from it are the most mature. The anterior end of the body, or forepart of the scolex, is provided with suckers, hooks, or foliaceous appendages, or with all three combined. There is no mouth or alimentary canal, so that it must derive materials for its nourishment only by absorption through the skin. The nervous system seems to consist of two small ganglia, sending filaments backward. There is a water-vascular system (q. v.). The whole animal is called a Strobilus. After a time some of the metameræ break off, the worm still continuing to grow. They continue to live till the ova are expelled. The numerous eggs which they contain ultimately rupture the tissue and escape after being voided with the evacuations of the person or animal in whose intestinal canal they were. The eggs are swallowed in water, or with grass and other herbs, and obtain a nidus for development in a new individual. The larvæ are oval, and have three pairs of hooks arranged in bilateral symmetry. Besides the cestoid sexual forms, there are cystic asexual conditions of many Tæniada.

tæ-nī-a-nō'-tūs, s. [Greek tainia=a band, and nōtos=the back.]

Ichthyol.: A genus of Scorpænidæ (q. v.), having the dorsal continuous with the caudal fin.

1. Bot.: An exotic genus of Tænitiidæ (q. v.).

2. Palæobot.: A genus of ferns with broad, ribbon-like fronds, simple or pinnate, secondary nerves running at right angles from the primary; fructification linear, the approximately parallel lines placed at the margin of the secondary veins. Seven species—one doubtful.

tæ'-nīte, s. [Gr. tainia=a band; suff. -ite; Ger. bandeisen.]

Min.: A name given to an alloy of iron and nickel found in certain meteoric irons, having the probable formula, Fe₄Ni₃.

tæ-nī-tīd'-ē-æ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. tæniti(is); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -ideæ.]

Bot.: A sub-tribe of Polypodiaceous Ferns, having no indusium.

tæ-nī'-tis, s. [TÆNIA.]

Botany: The typical genus of Tænitiidæ (q. v.). Sori submarginal in the middle of the disk of the leaf, linear, elongate, and continuous; veins anastomosing more or less regularly into meshes.

tæ-nī-ūr'-a, s. [Gr. tainia=a band, and oura=a tail.]

Ichthy.: A genus of Trygonidæ (q. v.), closely allied to the type-genus. [TRYGON.] There are six genera, from the East Indian seas and the fresh waters of tropical America.

tā'-ē-pīng, s. [See def.]

History: A member of a Chinese sect founded by Hung-sew-tseuen, a man of humble birth, who had renounced idolatry. He pretended to have visions, and to have received a divine command to root out the Tartars and establish a new kingdom of Tai-ping, or Universal Peace. In 1840 he gathered together a number of followers, assumed the name of Heavenly Prince, and declared himself to be equal with Christ in power on the earth. In 1850 his followers rose against the government, and succeeded in taking Nankin, but they were repulsed at Shanghai, in 1860, by the English and French, and though they afterward rebelled many times, were finally suppressed by General Gordon. Their religion was a mixture of idolatry and Christianity; polygamy was allowed; and while they adopted baptism, they rejected the Lord's Supper.

ta-fē', s. [Native name.] A fermented liquor prepared from rice in Java.

tāf'-fē-ta, tāf'-fē-tý, *tāf'-fa-ta, *tāf'-fa-tý, s. [Fr. taffetas, from Ital. taffeta, from Pers. tāftah=twisted, woven, taffeta; tāftān=to twist, to curl, to spin.] A term originally applied to plain woven silks; in more recent times signifying a light thin silk stuff with a considerable luster or gloss.

"There are taffeties of all colors, some plain, others striped with gold, silver, &c., others chequered, others flowered, others in the Chinese point, others the Hungarian; with various others, to which the mode or the caprice of the workmen give such whimsical names, that it would be as difficult as it is useless to rehearse them; besides that, they seldom hold beyond the year wherein they first rose. The old names of taffeties, and which still subsist, are Taffeties of Lyons, of Spain, of England, of Florence, of Avignon, &c. The chief consumption of taffeties is in summer dresses for women, and linings, in scarves, coats, window-curtains, &c."—Chambers: Cyclopædia (1741).

tā-gēt-ē-æ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. taget(es); Latin fem. pl. adj. suff. -eæ.]

Botany: A sub-tribe of Senecionideæ. American herbs, for the most part annual, with pellucid glands, many-flowered heads, the florets of the ray ligulate, feminine; pappus awned, hairy.

tāg-ē-tēs, s. [Named after Tages, an Etrurian divinity, the grandson of Jupiter, said to have sprung from the earth in the form of a boy, and to have taught the Etrurians the art of ploughing.]

Bot.: The typical genus of Tagetææ. Involute simple, of five bracts, united into a tube, florets of the ray persistent, pappus of five erect bristles. Natives of Mexico, Peru, and Chili. About seventeen species are cultivated in gardens. Tagetes patula is the French Marigold, a native not of France, but of Mexico. It is about a foot and a half high, has yellow, radiate, composite, strongly-scented flowers, which are in perfection in August. It is naturalized in Persia, India, and China, growing on the borders of rice fields, &c., at a distance from gardens. Many varieties are cultivated; some have double flowers, variegated with gold and orange-brown. T. erecta is the African Marigold, a native not of Africa, but of Mexico. It is larger than the last, and has double flowers, which are strongly scented. In India the flowers of the African Marigold are sold in the bazaars, and worn by women in their hair. A yellow domestic dye is said to be extracted from it by the poorer classes in India.

tagged, a. [Eng. tag; -ed.] Having a tag or tags.

"Viewing him away on the Withcote side with the body of the pack already straining at his well tagged brush."—Field, Jan. 2, 1886.

tāg-gēr, s. [Eng. tag, v.; -er.]

*1. One who tags or attaches one thing to another.

II. Technically:

1. Arch.: The bottom or lower part of a member or part.

2. Astron.: A luminous appendage streaming from the head of a comet, generally in a direction opposite to that of the sun.

3. Botany:

(1) A downy or feathery appendage to certain seeds, formed by the permanent elongate style.

(2) The long feathery, downy, or hairy termination of some fruits, as of Clematis chinensis.

(3) Any elongated, flexible, terminal part, as a petiole or peduncle. (Henslow.)

4. Comparative Anatomy:

(1) That tendon of a muscle which is fixed to the movable part.

(2) An appendage terminating the body behind. It is specially in the Vertebrates that it becomes important. In Fishes it is a vertical fin and a propeller, suggesting the screw of a modern steamboat; it varies much in form, one distinction of anatomical and palæontological importance being that between the Heterocercal and the Homocercal tails. [See these words.] The former of these makes

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camel, hēr, thēre; pīne, pīt, sīre, sīr, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rāle, fūll; trȳ, Sȳrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

an approach to the tail of the Reptile. [For Tailed Amphibia see Urodela.] In Birds the tail consists of feathers, which assist to steady the animal in flight. The typical number of feathers in a tail is twelve, but in the Rasores it is eighteen, while in a few birds it is eight. In form it may be even, rounded, fan-shaped, graduated, cuneated, arcuated, spatulate, slender, forked, lyre-shaped, boat-shaped, compressed, plumed, or scansorial. The tail in Cetaceans is modified into a powerful horizontal fin, acting as a propeller. In land mammals it varies in length, one use when it is well developed, as in the giraffe, the horse, &c., being to whisk away insects alighting to suck the blood. In Monkeys the tail greatly varies in length. In those of the New World it is long and prehensile; in many of those belonging to the Old World it is long but not prehensile. It is only rudimentary in the highest Apes. In Man it is normally absent, but the os coccyx, with certain other vertebrae, are its homologues. At an early embryonic period it is free, and even after birth it has been known, though very rarely, to exist in a rudimentary state.

5. Cricket: A term applied to the last few men in a batting eleven who are rather weaker than the rest.

6. Mason: The end of a stone step which is inserted into the wall; such a step has usually a tailing of nine inches.

"I shall discourse in some sort takingly."—Beaum. & Flot.: Woman Hater, iv. 2.

*tāk'-īng-nēss, s. [English taking; -ness.] The quality or state of being taking, pleasing, or attractive.

"All outward adornings have sometimes in them of a handsomeness and takingness."—Bishop Taylor: Artificial Handsomeness, p. 41.

tāl'-ā-pōin, tēl'-ā-pōin, s. [See def. 1.]

1. Ord. Lang.: The Siamese title of a priest of Fo; a bonze (q. v.).

2. Zool.: Cercopithecus talapoin, a small and rare monkey from the west coast of Africa. The general color is green, lower part of the body and under surface white. It differs in dentition from the rest of the genus.

*tāl'-ā-ræ, s. pl. [TALARIA.]

Bot.: Link's name for the wings of a papilionaceous corolla.

tā-lār'-ī-ā, s. pl. [Lat., from talus=an ankle.]

Class. Antiq.: The small wings attached to the ankles of Hermes, or Mercury, in representations of that deity. They sometimes appear as growing to the ankle, more commonly as attached to sandals, one on each side of each ankle.

tāl'-ā-vatch'-ī, s. [Native Mexican name.]

Toxicol.: A subtle poison, of which the constituents are unknown, formerly manufactured by the Aztecs, and by them handed down to their descendants, the Mexican Indians. Skillfully administered, it is said to destroy the mind, while leaving slight effects upon the body. It is said by some that the Empress Carlotta, of Mexico, was poisoned by this drug at the hands of an Indian beggar, and that to this cause, and not to grief at her husband's death, her insanity is due. Gen. Rudolfo Gunner, a former intimate and official of Maximilian's court, is given as the authority for this statement. The peculiar effect of the poison seems to be to induce monomania or epilepsy, and sometimes both. (Dr. L. B. Folkes.)

tā-lāu'-mā, s. [The South American name of one of the species.]

Bot.: A genus of Magnoliaceæ akin to Magnolia. Trees, or shrubs, with very fragrant flowers, natives of the hotter countries in both hemispheres.

tāl'-bōt, s. [Entom. doubtful.]

Zoology:

* 1. The name given to a race of dogs, allied to or identical with the Bloodhound.

"Gervase Markham describes a Talbot, which no doubt is a relation of the Bloodhound, as a round, thick-headed dog, with a short nose—characteristics which certainly do not appear in modern Bloodhounds."—Vero Shaw: Book of the Dog, p. 200.

† 2. A race of hounds, nearly, if not quite, extinct, which seem to have been kept for show rather than for use. Color pure white, large head, very broad muzzle, long pendulous ears, and rough hair on the belly. Talbot is the family name of the House of Shrewsbury, which has a Talbot for badge and two Talbots for supporters.

"The Talbot seems to have been something between the Northern and Southern Hounds, but the accounts we possess of this breed differ greatly."—Meyrick: House Dogs and Sporting Dogs, p. 27.

tāl'-bō-tŷpe, s. [After the name of the inventor, and Eng. type (q. v.).]

Photoq.: A process invented by Fox Talbot in 1840, and patented in 1841, in which paper was sensitized by iodide of silver and exposed in the camera. The surface became the recipient of a latent image, which was developed, and afterward fixed by hyposulphite of soda. It was named by its originator, Calotype (q. v.), and is the basis of the present photographic process.

tālc, s. [Etym. doubtful; prob. from Arab. talk; Ger. talck, talk.]

Mineralogy.

1. An orthorhombic mineral occurring in short hexagonal prisms and plates, also in globular and stellated groups, compact, massive. Cleavage, basal; hardness, 1 to 1.5; specific gravity, 2.565 to 2.8; luster, pearly; color, apple-green, white, shades of gray; sectile; feel, greasy. Composition, varying with the amount of water present, but essentially a hydrated silicate of magnesia which, when pure, would contain: Silica, 62.0; magnesia, 33.1; water 4.9=100, the formula being $6\text{MgO} \cdot 5\text{SiO}_2 \cdot 2\text{H}_2\text{O}$. Dana divides as follows: (1) Foliated; (2) Massive (steatite or soapstone); (a) Coarse Granular, including potstone; (b) Cryptocrystalline (French chalk); (c) Rensselaerite, cryptocrystalline, but more often pseudomorphous; (d) Indurated, a very abundant mineral. Being thoroughly incombustible, it is of great value in the manufacture of fire-proof wall-paper, paper window-curtains, &c. Even in its crude state it is found to yield one of the best lubricants known. Mixed with common grades of soap, it makes them as pleasant to the touch as the choicest brands, rendering the skin smooth and soft, although entirely without any cleaning qualities. It is also largely used in the manufacture of patent wall plaster, in which its addition gives a smooth, glossy finish to walls and ceilings that no other substance lends. Talc powder, duly refined, is exquisitely soft and fine grained. Hence it makes an excellent infant powder, softening the tenderest skin and preventing chafing, irritation, or even "prickly heat," as will no other substance. So, too, it makes an unsurpassed molding sand for casting metals in, both its fire-proof and fire-grained qualities being very valuable in fine work. Mixed with rubber, it renders it more elastic and less liable to crack. From it is also made the "French chalk" used by tailors, and shoe-dealers use it in the powdered form to enable one to pull on a tight-fitting shoe. The richest talc mines are now being worked in Cherokee County, North Carolina, where it is found in leaves and scales, very much like slate.

2. A commercial name for mica (q. v.).

† Oil of talc: [OIL OF TALC.]

talc-apatite, s.

Min.: An apatite found in chlorite schist in the Urals, containing a large percentage of magnesia replacing lime. A magnesium-apatite.

talc-chlorite, s.

Min.: A mineral regarded by Marignac as intermediate between talc and chlorite, but stated by Des Cloizeaux to possess the optical characters of clinochlore. Dana suggests that it may be the latter mineral mixed with talc, which would account for the high percentage of silica.

talc-gneiss, s.

Petrol.: A gneiss which contains a hydrated mica, frequently, but erroneously, called talc.

talc iron-ore, s.

Min.: A variety of magnetite (q. v.) having weak magnetic properties, in which a part of the protoxide of iron is replaced by magnesia.

talc-schist, s.

Petrol.: A schistose rock consisting wholly or largely of talc, with varying amounts of quartz, and some accessory minerals.

talc-spar, s.

Min.: The same as BREUNERITE (q. v.).

talc-steatite, s.

Min.: The same as TALC (q. v.).

tālc'-īte, s. [Eng. talc; -ite (Min.)]

Mineralogy.

1. A name given by Thomson to a white muscovite (q. v.) from Wicklow.

2. Kirwan's name for a massive scaly talc.

tālc'-k'ý, tālc'-ý, a. [Eng. talc; -y.] The same as TALCOSE (q. v.).

tālc'-ōid, s. [Eng. talc; suff. -oid; Ger. talkoid.]

Min.: A snow-white variety of talc occurring in broad folia at Pressnitz, Bohemia. It contained over 67 per cent. of silica. Probably only ordinary talc with disseminated free quartz.

tālc'-ōse, tālc'-oūs, a. [Eng. talc; -ose, -ous.]

Min. & Petrol.: Partaking of the characters of talc (q. v.).

talcose-granite, s. [PROTICINE.]

talcose-slate, s. [TALC-SCHIST.]

tālc'-ō-site, s. [Eng. talcose; suff. -ite (Min.)]

Min.: A mineral occurring in thin veins of scaly structure, resembling talc. Hardness, 1-2; specific gravity, 2.46-2.5; luster, pearly; color, silver-white, greenish, yellowish. Composition: A hydrated silicate of alumina, probably related to selwynite (q. v.). Occurs at Mount Ada, Heathcote, Victoria.

tālc'-oūs, a. [TALCOSE.]

tālc'-trīp'-lite, s. [Eng. talc, and tripelite.]

Min.: A variety of tripelite (q. v.), in which part of the protoxide of manganese is replaced by lime. Its position as a distinct variety is not, however, determined. Occurs in small yellowish grains in the lazulite rock of Horrsjöberg, Sweden.

tāle (1), s. [TAIL.]

tāle (2), s. [A. S. talū=a number, a narrative; cogn. with Dut. taal=language, tongue, speech; Icel. tal=talk, a tale; tala=a number, a speech; Dan. tale=speech; Sw. tal=speech, number; O. H. Ger. zala; Ger. zahl=number. From the same root comes tell.]

tā'-lēd, tāl'-īth, subst. [Heb. talith.]

Jewish Antiq.: A garment of fine linen with a fringe attached to it, worn by the Jews in Talmudic times. It was ample in size, so as to admit of the head being enveloped in it while its wearer engaged in prayer.

tāle'-fūl, a. [Eng. tale (2), s.; -ful (1).] Abounding with stories.

"The cottage-hind

Hangs o'er th' enlivening blaze, and taleful there

Recounts his simple frolic."—Thomson: Winter, 90.

tā-lē-gāl'-lā, s. [Composed of native name, and Lat. gallus=a cock.]

Ornith.: Brush-turkey; a genus of Megapodidae (q. v.), with two species from East Australia and New Guinea. Closely akin to the type-genus Megapodius (q. v.), but with wattled skin on the head and neck, whence the early settlers gave these birds the name of Brush-turkeys, though they have no affinity with the genus Meleagris (q. v.).

tāl'-ent (1), tal-ente, s. [Fr. talent=a talent in money, will, desire, earnest humor to, from Lat. talentum; Gr. talanton=a balance, . . . a weight, sum of money, a talent, from the same root as talas (genit. talantos)=bearing, enduring; etlèn=I endured; Lat. tolero=to tolerate; tollo=to lift, to sustain; Sansc. tul=to lift, to weigh; tukana=lifting; tulā=a balance, a weight; Sp. talante, talento; Ital. & Port. talanto.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Lit.: In the same sense as II.

"When he had begun to reckon, one was brought unto him which owed him ten thousand talents."—Matthew xviii. 24.

2. Figuratively:

(1) A gift, endowment, or faculty; some peculiar faculty, ability, power, or accomplishment, natural or acquired. (A metaphor borrowed from the parable in St. Matthew xxv. 14-30.)

"It is no inconsiderable branch of the minister's art to discern the talents of men, to know what they are fit for."—Search: Light of Nature, vol. i., pt. ii., ch. xxxiv.

(2) Mental endowments or capacities of a superior kind; general mental power. (Used in either the singular or the plural.)

"So many youths of distinguished talent."—Cowper: Works (ed. Southey) ii. 71.

(3) Hence, used for talented persons collectively; men of ability or talent.

"All the real talent in England."—Ruskin: Seven Lamps, p. 189.

6) Desire, affection, will.

"But the imaginacion cometh of remuable beastes, that semen to have talente [affectus] to flie, or to desire any thyng."—Chaucer: Boecius, p. 450.

(7) Habitual backers of horses, or takers of odds, as opposed to the bookmakers, or layers of odds. (Racing slang.)

"All the talent were discomfited, though, as they often are in Nurseries."—Field, Oct. 3, 1885.

II. Greek Antiquity: The name of a weight and also of a denomination of money among the ancient Greeks, and also applied by Greek writers and their translators to various standard weights and denominations of money among different nations; the weight and value differing in the various nations and at various times. As a weight, those in general use were the Euboic or Attic talent = 56 lbs. 11 oz. troy, and the Æginetan = about 82½ lbs. The Attic talent contained sixty Attic minæ. As a denomination of money, it was a talent's weight of silver, or a sum of money equivalent to this; so that in our current coin the Attic talent would be worth $1,185.84. The great talent of the Romans was equal to $483.25, and the little talent to $364.87½. The Hebrew talent (2 Sam. xii. 30) was equal to 93 lbs. 12 oz. avoirdupois; and as a denomination of money it has been variously estimated at from $1,520.31 to $1,926.54. The marginal note in the A. V. to Matt. xviii. 24, says that "a talent is 750 ounces of silver, which, at 5s. [$1.20] the ounce, is £187, 10s. [$900]." The illustration represents a bronze talent found at Abydos.

Talent.

† For the difference between talent, gift, and intellect, see GIFT and INTELLECT.

† Ministry of all the Talents:

English Hist.: A ministry of which Lord Grenville was the head, and Fox his colleague and supporter. It was formed on Jan. 26, 1806, three days after the death of Pitt, and, after undergoing some changes, was dissolved on March 25, 1807. Its nickname was given from the boast of Mr. Canning and others that it contained all the talent of the country—i. e., of both political parties in the State.

tāl'-ent (2), s. [TALON.]

tāl'-ent-ēd, a. [Eng. talent (1); -ed.] Furnished or endowed with talents or great mental powers; possessing genius, talents, or abilities.

"While talenting and similar words have no existence, there is a very obvious reason why words of the class of talented are numerous; namely, that we oftener have occasion to express, through a verb, the ideas of 'possessed of a quality or attribute,' 'endowedness,' &c., than we have to express, through the same part of speech, the idea of 'communicating a quality or attribute,' 'endowing,' &c., among which ideas are those denoted by the

¶ This word has often been assailed, and condemned as a "pseudo-participle," having no verb to correspond with it. But many words, universally recognized as good English, are open to the same objection, as gifted, booted, lettered, landed, &c. (See Fitzedward Hall: Modern English, pp. 70-75.)

tāl'-ēr*, tālil'-ēr*, s. [Eng. tal(e), v.; -er.] One who tells or spreads tales.

"If he be a tailer of idle words."—Chaucer: Parsones Tale.

tā'-lēš, s. pl. [Lat., masc. pl. of talīs=such.]

Law: Persons of like reputation or standing; persons in the court from whom the sheriff or his clerk makes selections to supply the places of jurors who have been impaneled, but who are not in attendance.

"If by means of challenges, or other cause, a sufficient number of unexceptionable jurors do not appear at the trial, either party may pray a tales, in order to make up a deficiency: the judge being empowered, at the prayer of either party, to award a tales de circumstantibus, of persons present in court, to be joined to the other jurors to try the cause; who are liable, however, to the same challenges as the principal jurors. This is usually done till the legal number of twelve he completed."—Blackstone: Comment., bk. iii., ch. 13.

¶ To pray a tales:

Law: To pray that the number of jurymen may be completed. A tales was prayed in the celebrated Tichborne case (1873).

"After a great deal of bawling, it was discovered that only ten special jurymen were present. Upon this, Mr. Sergeant Buzfuz prayed a tales; the gentleman in black then proceeded to press into the special jury two of the common jurymen."—Dickens: Pickwick, ch. xxxiv.

tales-book, s.

Law: A book containing the names of such as are admitted of the tales.

tales-man, s.

Law: A person summoned to act as a juror from among the bystanders in open court.

"When a sufficient number of persons impaneled, or tales-men, appear, they are then separately sworn well and truly to try the issue between the parties, and a true verdict to give according to the evidence; and hence they are denominated the jury, jurata, and jurors, sc. juratores."—Blackstone: Comment., bk. iii., ch. 13.

tallow-tree, s.

Botany:

1. Stillingia sebifera, a native of China. The leaves are rhomboidal, tapering at the tip, with two glands at the top of the petiole. The fruits are about half an inch in diameter, and have three seeds, which are covered by a kind of wax, used in China for making candles, whence the name tallow-tree. They are boiled in large cauldrons, then sufficiently bruised to enable the fat to be removed without breaking the seeds, and pressed. The candles made from this wax are coated with bees' wax to prevent them from melting in hot weather. The wood is hard, and used for printing blocks, and the leaves for dyeing black.

2. Vateria indica, a native of the Malabar coast. [VATERIA.]

3. Pentadesma butyracea. [PENTADESMA.]

táll'-lôw, v. t. [TALLOW, s.]

táll'-wood, s. [Fr. taille=a cutting; taillé=cut, and Eng. wood.] Firewood, cut in billets of a certain length.

"Also, if any person . . . offer or put to sale any tallwood, billets, faggots, or other firewood, &c."—Coltrop's Reports (1690).

táll'-ly (1), taille, tal-y, s. [Fr. taille=a notch, an incision, a tally or score kept on a piece of wood, from Lat. talea=a slip of wood; Sp. taja; Port. talka; Ital. taglia.]

1. A notched stick employed as a means of keeping accounts. In buying or selling it was customary for the parties to the transaction to have two sticks, or one stick cleft longitudinally into two parts, on each of which was marked with notches or cuts the number or quality of goods delivered, or the amount due between debtor and creditor, the seller keeping one stick and the buyer the other. The mode of keeping accounts by tallies was introduced into England by the Normans, 1066. Besides accounts, other records were formerly kept upon notched sticks, as almanacs, in which red-letter days were signified by a large notch, ordinary days by small notches, &c. Such were formerly very common in most European countries. In England tallies were long issued in lieu of certificates of indebtedness to creditors of the State. In 1696, according to Adam Smith, this species of security was at 40-60 per cent. discount, and bank-notes 20 per cent. Seasoned sticks of willow or hazel were provided, and these were notched on the edge to represent the amount. Small notches represented pence; larger, shillings; still larger, pounds; proportionately larger and wider, were 10, 100, 1,000 pounds. The stick being now split longitudinally, one piece was given to the creditor, and the other was laid away as a record. When an account was presented for payment, the voucher was compared with the record. When paid, the tally and counter-tally were tied up together, and laid away, accumulating for a long series of years. The system of issuing exchequer tallies was abolished by 25 George III., c. 82; and by 4 and 5 William IV., c. 15, the accumulated tallies were ordered to be destroyed. They were accordingly burned in a stove in the House of Lords, but the stove being over-heated, unfortunately set fire to the paneling of the room, and the Houses of Parliament were destroyed.

"The price of those wooden tallies, which, according to an usage handed down to us from a rude age, were given as receipts for sums paid into the Exchequer, had risen."—Macaulay: Eng. Hist., ch. xxii.

*2. Anything made to correspond with or suit another.

"So right his judgment was cut fit,

And made a tally to his wit."

Butler: Hudibras, III., ii. 395.

tally-board, s. A small board attached to the life-line thrown by means of a rocket-apparatus to ships wrecked or in danger, when the life-boat cannot reach them.

"The sailors hauled the whip-line on board, and when the tally-board, on which the directions for the method of procedure are printed in English on one side and French on the other, was received, the captain attempted by the light of a lantern to read them."—Scribner's Magazine, Jan., 1880, p. 330.

tally-shop, s. A shop or store at which goods are sold on the tally-system (q. v.).

tally-system, tally-trade, s.

1. A system of trade carried on in many large English towns, by which shopkeepers supply goods to their customers on credit, the latter agreeing to pay the price charged by certain weekly installments. Both parties keep books, in which are entered the particulars of the transaction and the payments of the installments. The prices charged are usually exorbitant, and the goods of an inferior quality. (Eng.)

2. A system by which drapery goods are supplied to women, chiefly in country districts, and paid for by weekly installments. (See extract under TALLYMAN, 1.) (Eng.) tāl'-lŷ (2), subst. [See def.] An abbreviation of Tally-ho (q. v.).

*3. To repay in like kind.

"Civill law teacheth, that long custome prescribeth: divinity, that old things are passed. Moral philosophy, that tallying of injuries is justice."—Bishop Hall: Holy Observations, § 50.

¶ In this sense perhaps connected with Lat. talio=retaliation.

II. Naut.: To pull aft, as the sheets or lower corners of the main and fore-sail.

B. Intransitive:

1. To fit, to correspond, to agree, to conform, to match.

*2. To deal (cards); a phrase in basset and pharaoh. (Cibber: Careless Husband, iii. 1.)

tāl'-lŷ (2), v. t. [TALLY (2), s.] To cry tally-ho after.

tāl'-lŷ, adv. [Eng. tal(l); -ly.] Stoutly; exactly.

tāl'-lŷ-mān, s. [Eng. tally (1), s., and man.]

1. One who carries on a tally-trade; one who sells goods on credit, to be paid for by installments.

"We do not know whether the tallyman has ever appeared in fiction before. We may explain that he is a very dangerous trader, who lets his customers—who, it may be said, are always women—have goods unknown to their husbands, to be paid for by weekly installments."—Spectator, March 14, 1884, p. 363.

2. One who keeps a tally or account; a tallier.

tāl'-ma, s. [Prob. after Talma, the French tragedian.] A kind of large cape or short full cloak, worn by ladies, and sometimes by gentlemen.

tāl'-mī, s. [Etym. doubtful.] (See compound.)

talmi-gold, s. [ABYSSINIAN-GOLD.]

Tāl'-mūd, s. [Heb. Talmudh=instruction, doctrine; lamadh=to chastise, to train, to teach; cf. talmidh=a scholar. (1 Chron. xxv. 8.)]

Hebrew Literature: A work in which was committed to writing that "tradition of the elders" which in the time of Jesus was chiefly or exclusively oral (Matt. xv. 2-3; Mark vii. 5, 9, 13; viii. 9). The early spiritual leaders of the Jewish people, accepting the Old Testament as divine, naturally made it the object of much thought, and attempted to furnish explanations of the more obscure passages, these explanations, if felicitous, being handed down from generation to generation, till they gradually acquired the authority due to inspiration. The Mosaic law contained a multitude of regulations—moral, ceremonial, civil, and criminal—which priests, prophets, lawyers, and other high authorities interpreted. These were from the first regarded with the veneration with which the decisions of law courts on the meaning of certain statutes are received among modern nations, till at length they were deemed incontrovertible, and attributed to Divine inspiration, and were finally committed to writing, the ultimate product being the Talmud.

When it appeared it became a second rule or standard of faith and practice, the first being the Old Testament, and no Jew was required to believe any doctrine or follow any religious, moral, or ceremonial precepts except those recorded in one or the other of the two standards. The Talmud had two constituent parts, the text, or Mishna, and the commentary, or Gemara. The midrashim, or explaining and amplifying Old Testament teaching, began previous to the writing of the books of Chronicles, which allude to their existence. (2 Chron. xiii. 22; xxiv. 27.) They continued till the second century A. D., and were of two kinds—halacha (the rule) and hagada (what is said), but only the first was binding. The germ of the present Mishna proceeded from R. Jehuda Hanasi, A. D. 219, but was preserved only in the memory of scholars, till the destruction of the academies of Palestine in the fourth century and those of Babylonia in the fifth, showed the necessity of committing it to writing. Hence in the end of the fourth century the Jerusalem, and in the fifth the Babylonian, Talmud was sent forth. The latter was compiled by R. Ashe, who died A. D. 427, and his immediate successors, and is about four times as long as the Jerusalem Talmud. The Talmud consists of six sedharim, or orders, containing sixty-three massicot, or treatises, and 525 perakim, or chapters. The Mishna is in Hebrew, the Gemara is Aramaean. The contents of the work are miscellaneous. In addition to religion and ethics, there are philosophy, history, &c. Rabbinical Jews set the Talmud on a higher level than the Old Testament. Christians long depreciated it, believing it a mass of exaggeration, puerility, and absurdity. Now, though, it is admitted that the charges are true in many passages, the book as a whole is known to be a storehouse of information regarding Judaism in its later developments.

tāl'-mūd'-ic, tāl'-mūd'-ic-al, a. [English talmud; -ic, -ical.] Of or pertaining to the Talmud; contained in the Talmud.

"These phrases are by the great Broughton called talmudic Greek, when Jewish and talmudical phrases are used in holy writ."—Lightfoot: Miscellanies, p. 68.

tāl'-mūd'-ist, subst. [English talmud; -ist.] One versed or learned in the Talmud.

"He soon attracted the attention of the great Talmudist, Saul Levi Morteira."—G. H. Lewes: History of Philosophy (ed. 1880), ii. 165.

tāl'-mūd'-ist'-ic, *tāl'-mūd'-ist'-ick, adj. [Eng. talmud; -istic.] Pertaining to the Talmud; contained in the Talmud; talmudic.

"The name Ariel came from the talmudistick mysteries, with which the learned Jews had infected the science."—T. Warton: Hist. Eng., Poetry, iii. 478.

1. Zoöl.: A family of Insectivora, limited to the temperate regions of Europe, Asia, and North America. The species are fossorial, rarely natatorial, distinguished from the Soricidæ by the presence of zygomatic arches and the form of the teeth. Eyes very small, in some species covered with skin; ears short and hidden by the fur; the fore-limbs modified for digging. There are two sub-families Myogalinæ and Talpinæ (q. v.).

2. Palæont.: There are several extinct genera commencing with Talpavus (q. v.), and ending with Palæospalax (q. v.). [TALPA, 2.]

tāl'-pī-næ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. talp(a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -inæ.]

Zoöl.: The typical sub-family of Talpidæ (q. v.). Clavicles and humeri very short and broad; large falciform bone in the manus. There are five genera, divided into two groups.

A. Having front upper incisors much larger than second pair (New World Moles), Scalops, Scapanus, and Condylura.

B. Front incisors scarcely larger than second pair (Old World Moles), Scaptonix and Talpa.

tāl'-tal'-ite, s. [After Taltal, Atacama, South America, where found; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: Supposed by David Forbes, who named it, to be a distinct species, but shown by Pisani to be a tourmaline mixture with oxide of copper and other impurities.

tā'-lus, s. [Lat.]

1. Anat.: The ankle bone. It articulates with the tibia above, the os calcis below, and the scaphoid in front. It receives the weight of the body from the leg. Its convex anterior extremity is termed the head, and the circular groove behind it the neck. Called also the astragalus (q. v.).

2. Arch.: The slope or inclination of any work, as of a wall inclined on its face, either by decreasing in thickness toward the summit or by leaning it against a bank, as a retaining or breast-wall.

3. Fort.: The slope of a work, as a bastion, rampart, or parapet. (In this sense written also talut.)

4. Geol.: A sloping heap of rocky fragments broken off from the face of a steep rock by the action of the weather, and accumulating at its base. So called from its resemblance to a talus in fortification. [3.]

5. Surg.: A variety of club-foot, in which the heel rests on the ground, and the toes are drawn toward the leg. (Goodrich.)

tā'-lūt, s. [TALUS, 3.]

tāl'-vaş, subst. [Etym. doubtful.] A kind of wooden buckler or shield of an oblong form, bent on each side, and rising in the middle. It was in use in the fourteenth century.

tām-a-bīl'-i-tŷ, tām-a-bīl'-i-tŷ, subst. [Eng. tamable; -ity.] The quality or state of being tamable; tamableness.

"The tameability of mankind."—S. Smith: Letters, 1321.

tām-a-ble, tām-a-ble, a. [Eng. tam(e)-able.] Capable of being tamed or of being reclaimed from a wild or savage state.

"Ganzas are supposed to be great fowls, of a strong flight, and easily tameable."—Wilkins: Dædalus, ch. vii.

tām-a-ble-ness, s. [English tamable; -ness.] The quality or state of being tamable; tamability.

ta-ma'-le, s. [Sp. tamal.]

Cuisine: A kind of boiled dumpling, very popular in the Western States, consisting of minced chicken and Indian maize meal, boiled in a corn-husk. It is highly seasoned, and is usually sold on the streets of the Western towns, in the evening, on winter nights, by hucksters who carry with them portable furnaces and boilers to keep the tamales hot. The cry of "Hot tamales!" forms a feature of night-life in the streets of the Western cities of this country.

ta-mān'-du-a, s. [Native name.]

Zoölogy:

1. A genus of Myrmecophagidæ, from the forests of South and Central America. In anatomical structure the genus is closely akin to Myrmecophaga (q. v.), but the head is less elongated, the fur short and bristly, the tail tapering and prehensile, the top of the terminal part and the under side throughout naked and scaly. The fifth toe on the fore feet is concealed within the skin. Only one species has been distinguished, Tamandua tetradactyla; but as different individuals vary greatly in coloration, it is not improbable that other species exist.

2. Tamandua tetradactyla, an Ant-eater, smaller than the Great Ant-eater or Ant-bear, from which it differs in being arboreal. The usual color is yellowish-white, with a broad, black lateral band, which covers nearly the whole of the side of the body.

tām'-an-oir (oir as wār), s. [See def.]

Zoöl.: The native name of Myrmecophaga jubata. [ANT-BEAR.]

tām'-an-ū, s. [Native name.]

Bot. & Comm.: A heavy green resin brought from the Society Islands. It is derived from Calophyllum inophyllum.

tām'-a-ra, s. [E. Indian.] A term applied to a spice consisting of equal parts of cinnamon, cloves, and coriander seeds, with half the quantity of aniseed and fennel seed, all powdered. It is a favorite condiment with Italians.

tām'-a-räck, s. [The Canadian Indian name.]

Bot.: The American or Black Larch, Larix pendula or americana, called also Abies pendula. It has weak and drooping branches, which sometimes take root, forming a natural arch. The leaves are clustered and deciduous, the cones oblong with numerous spreading scales. It constitutes a feature of the forests in Canada and the Northern United States. Its timber is valuable, but less so than the larch. It is cultivated in Europe, being more graceful and greener than the Common Larch.

tām'-a-rī-cā'-čě-æ, s. pl. [Lat. tamarix, genit. tamaric(is); fem. pl. adj. suff. -aceæ.]

Bot.: Tamarisks; an order of Hypogynous Exogens, alliance Violales. Shrubs or herbs with rod-like branches. Leaves alternate, scale-like, entire, usually pitted; flowers in close spikes or racemes; calyx four or five-parted, persistent, imbricated in veneration; petals inserted into the base of the calyx, imbricated in aestivation; stamens equal in number to the petals, or twice as many, distinct or monadelphous; styles three, ovary superior. Fruit capsular, three-valved, one-celled, many seeds on three placentas. Found in the Northern Hemisphere of the Old World. Known genera three, species forty-three. (Lindley.)

tām'-a-rin, s. [Native name.]

Zoöl.: A popular name for any species of the genus Midas (q. v.). The body is long and slender, clothed with soft hair, and the tail, which is non-prehensile, is about twice the length of the trunk. They are very restless and active, but are easily tamed, and are made pets of by the natives of Central America. [MARMOSET.]

tām'-a-rind, tām'-a-rinde, s. [Fr. tamarind = a small, soft, and dark-red Indian date (Cotgrave, in Skeat); tamarin=the fruit of the tamarind, tamarinier=the tree itself (Littré); Sp. & Ital. tamarindo; Port. tamarindo, tamarhino; Arab. thamar-hindi=the Indian date, to which tree the tamarind has no affinity.]

1. Botany: Tamarindus indica. Leaves abruptly pinnate, with many pairs of small leaflets; flowers in racemes; calyx straw-colored; petals yellow, streaked with red, filaments purple, anthers brown. It is an evergreen tree, eighty feet high by twenty-five in circumference, cultivated in India as far north as the Jhelum, and very largely planted in avenues and 'topes.' The wood, which is yellowish-white, sometimes with red streaks, is hard and close-grained.

Tamarind.

(Showing flowers, leaflets, legume, and seed.)

The flowers and fruit are used in India as an astringent or as a mordant in dyeing, especially with safflower; the leaves furnish a yellow dye. The seeds yield a clear, bright, fluid oil, with an odor like that of the linseed; their powder mixed with thin glue makes a strong cement for wood. The West Indian and South American variety of T. indica (var. occidentalis) has legumes only three times as long as broad, whereas the Indian tree has them six times as long.

2. Comm.: The tamarinds sold in this country are chiefly West Indian tamarinds. They differ from the Black or East Indian tamarinds, of which the preserved pulp is black.

3. Pharm.: In pharmacy tamarinds are used as gentle laxatives; they are refrigerant from the acids which they contain, and, when infused, constitute a cooling drink in fevers. They enter into the Confectio sennæ. In India the seeds are given in dysentery, &c.; in the Mauritius a decoction of the bark is given in asthma.

tamarind-fish, s. A preparation of a kind of East Indian fish with the acid pulp of the tamarind fruit, much esteemed as a breakfast relish in India.

tamarind-plum, s.

Bot.: Dialium indicum, one of the Cynometreæ. The legume has a delicate agreeable pulp, less acid than that of the tamarind.

tām'-a-rin'-dūs, s. [TAMARIND.]

Bot.: A genus of Cæsalpinieæ, tribe Amherstieæ. Calyx cleft, tubular at the base, two-lipped, the upper lip of three reflexed segments, the lower of two segments united; petals three, the middle one hood-shaped, the side ones ovate; stamens nine or ten; all but three short and without anthers; legume filled with pulp, and containing strong fibers; seeds three to six. Only one known species, Tamarindus indica; T. occidentalis, or the West Indian tamarind, being now deemed only a variety. [TAMARIND.]

tām'-ar-īs-cin'-ě-æ, s. pl. [Lat. tamarisc(us); fem. pl. adj. suff. -ineæ.]

Bot.: The same as TAMARICACEÆ (q. v.).

tām'-a-risk, tām-a-riske, s. [Lat. tamarix, tamarice, tamariscus, tamaricum; Fr. tamaris, tamarisc, tamarix; Prov. tamarisc.] [TAMARIX.]

Botany:

1. The genus Tamarix (q. v.).

2. (Pl.): The Tamaricaceæ or Tamariscineæ (q. v.).

¶ German tamarisk:

Bot.: Myricaria germanica.

tā-mar-ite, s. [After the Tamar mines, Devon, where it was supposed to have been first found; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: The same as CHALCOPHYLLITE (q. v.).

tām'-a-rix, subst. [Lat. = a tamarisk; said to be from the Tamaris (now the Tambro), a river of Spain, along which tamarisks abound.]

Bot.: Tamarisk; the typical genus of Tamaricaceæ or Tamariscineæ. Sepals four to five, equal, distinct; petals four to five, distinct, or united at the base; stamens four to ten; styles three or four; stigmas distinct, sessile, feathery; capsule one-seeded, three-valved; seeds numerous, without a beak; pappose. Known species twenty; all from the eastern hemisphere. They are shrubs growing gregariously in bushy clumps, along river banks or basins, &c., in desert tracts, as along the banks of the Suez Canal. T. gallica, the French, called also

T. anglica, an evergreen shrub or small tree, five to ten feet high, with very slender and feathery branches, minute, amplexicaul, adpressed, acute leaves, and lateral, somewhat paniced spikes of white or pink flowers, is found on the south and east coasts of England, but is an alien. It is wild on the Continental European shores of the Atlantic and the Mediterranean, and in Western Asia and India. Its bark is slightly bitter and astringent. This species, and Tamarix africana, if burnt, yields much sulphate of soda. T. mannifera produces the manna of Mount Sinai, which, however, is not a natural exudation from the tree, but arises from a puncture of an insect, Coccus mannipara. T. dioica and T. articulata (called also T. orientalis) are found on the banks of rivers and on sea coasts throughout India. The former yields a gum which appears nodular, and is transparent in the central speck of each tear, while opaque on the circumference. The latter also furnishes a small quantity of gum. The galls and bark of T. indica, T. dioica, T. furas, and T. orientalis are used in tanning and as an auxiliary in dyeing. They are also used medicinally as astringents. Their action is due to the tannic and gallic acids which they contain.

Tamarisk.

1. Branchlets, with leaves natural size; 2. Branchlet magnified; 3. A flower.

tām'-bac, s. [TOMBAC.]

1. The same as TOMBAC (q. v.).

2. Agallochum or aloes-wood.

tām'-bôur, s. [Fr.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. A drum.

"Till I, who heard the deep tambour Beat thy Divan's approaching hour."

Byron: Bride of Abydos, i. 3.

2. A circular frame on which silk or other stuff is stretched for the purpose of being embroidered. So called from its resemblance to the head of a drum.

3. A species of embroidery in which threads of gold and silver are worked by needles in figures of leaves and flowers upon a silk stuff stretched over a circular frame, called a tambour-frame.

II. Technically:

1. Architecture:

(1) A term applied to the naked part of Corinthian and Composite capitals, which bears some resemblance to a drum. Also called the Vase and Campana, or the Bell.

(2) The wall of a circular temple surrounded with columns.

(3) The circular vertical part both above and below a cupola.

(4) A kind of lobby or vestibule of timber-work, with folding-doors, and covered with a ceiling, as within the porches of churches, &c., to break the current of wind from without.

(5) A cylindrical stone, such as one of the courses of the shaft of a column.

2. Fort.: A kind of work formed of palisades, or pieces of wood ten feet long, planted closely together, and driven firmly into the ground, and intended to defend a road, gate, or other entrance.

Music: An instrument of the guitar species, with strings of wire struck with a plectrum. The neck is long, and the body, of gourd-shape, is often beautifully ornamented. The tamboura is found in Persia, Turkey, Egypt, and Hindustan, and it was known to the Assyrians and Egyptians under various names.

tām'-bôur'-gī, s. [Turkish.] A drummer.

"Tambourgil tambourgil! thy larum afar Gives hopes to the valiant and promise of war."

Byron: Childe Harold, ii. lxxii.

tām'-bou-rîne', tām-bou-rin, tām-bu-rin, tām-bu-rine, s. [Fr. tambourin, dimin. from tambour=a drum, a tambour.]

Music:

1. An ancient pulsatile instrument of the drum class, popular among all European people, but particularly those of the south. The Biscayan and Italian peasantry employ it on every festive occasion. It is formed of a hoop of wood, sometimes of metal, over which is stretched a piece of parchment or skin; the sides of the hoop are pierced with holes, in which are inserted pieces of metal in pairs, called jingles. Small bells are sometimes fastened on to the outer edge of the hoop. It is sounded by being struck with the knuckles, or by drawing the fingers or thumb over the skin, which produces what is called "the roll," a peculiar drone mingled with the jingle of the bells or pieces of metal.

"Each her ribboned tambourine Flinging on the mountain sod."

Matthew Arnold: Empedocles on Etna, ii.

2. A stage dance formerly popular in France. It was of a lively measure, and accompanied with a pedal bass in imitation of the drone caused by rubbing the thumb over the skin of a tambourine.

tām-breēt, s. [See def.]

2. To subdue; to put or keep down; to conquer; to overpower.

"To tame and abate the appetites of the flesh."—Tyndall: Works, p. 22.

tāme* (2), v. t. [French entamer=to cut into, to make the first cut upon, to begin on.] To begin upon by taking a part of; to broach or taste, as liquor; to deal out, to divide, to distribute.

"In the time of the famine he is the Joseph of the country, and keeps the poor from starving. Then he tameth his stacks of corn, which not his covetousness, but providence, hath reserved for time of need."—Fuller.

tāme'-a-ble, a. [TAMABLE.]

tāme'-lēss, tāme'-lesse*, a. [Eng. tame; -less.] Incapable of being tamed; untamable.

"As the sea wind's on the sea his ways are tameless."

A. C. Swinburne: Statue of Victor Hugo.

tāme'-lēss-nēss, s. [Eng. tameless; -ness.] The quality or state of being tameless.

"From thee this tamelessness of heart."

Byron: Parisina, xiii.

tāme'-lŷ, adv. [Eng. tame; -ly.] In a tame manner; without spirit or energy; meanly, spiritlessly, servilely; with unresisting submission.

"Though tamely crouch to Gallia's frown Dull Holland's tardy train." Scott: War Song.

tāme'-nēss, s. [Eng. tame; -ness.]

I. Lit.: The quality or state of being tame or gentle; a state of domestication.

II. Figuratively:

1. Want of spirit or energy; meanness in bearing insults or injury.

"An indication of uncommon tameness and timidity."—Cook: First Voyage, bk. iii., ch. vi.

2. Absence of interest, or animation; dullness; as, the tameness of a narrative.

tāmp'-ēr, s. [Eng. tame, v.; -er.] One who tames or subdues; a subduer, a conqueror.

"Daughter of Jove, relentless power,

Thou tamer of the human breast,"

Gray: Hymn to Adversity.

tām'-ī-ās, s. [Gr. tamias=a distributor, a dispenser, a steward. The name has reference either to the cheek-pouches in which these animals can stow a large quantity of food, or to their habit of laying up stores of food in their holes.]

Zoöl.: Ground-squirrel; a genus of Sciurinae, with four species, all found in North America, one of which (Tamias asiaticus) extends through Siberia into Eastern Europe. The species are characterized by the possession of cheek-pouches, and by their coloration, the fur of the back being marked with alternate light and dark bands. They are popularly known as chipmunks, and are among the commonest of the indigenous rodents.

Tām'-il, Tām'-ūl, s. [Native name.]

1. One of a race inhabiting the south of India and Ceylon. They belong to the Dravidian stock.

2. The language spoken in the southeast of the Madras Presidency and in the northern parts of Ceylon. It is richly polysyllabic, of a very high type of agglutination, like the Finnish and Hungarian, with prefixes only, and is very soft and harmonious in utterance.

Tā-mīl'-ī-ān, a. [Eng. Tamil; -ian.] Of or pertaining to the Tamils or their language.

tām'-īne, tām'-īn-ŷ, tām'-mīn, tām'-mŷ, s. [Fr. étamine.] [STAMIN.]

1. A thin woolen or worsted stuff, highly glazed.

2. A sieve; a strainer or bolter of hair or cloth.

tām'-is* (s silent), tam-ise*, s. [Fr. tamis.] [TEMSE.]

1. A sieve, a strainer.

"Transmitting the light thereof as it were throw a tamise or strainer."—P. Holland: Plutarch, p. 674.

2. The same as TAMINE (q. v.).

tamis-bird*, s. A Guinea fowl.

tām'-kin, s. [For tampkin.] [TAMPION.] The stopper of a cannon.

Tām'-ma-nŷ, s. [See def.] A corruption of the name Tamendy or Tammenund, an Indian chief of the Delaware tribe. Why the name was applied in the compound does not appear.

Tammany-ring, s. A name sometimes applied in condemnation to the Tammany Society of New York, a political organization in sympathy with the Democratic party.

tām'-īte, s. [After Hugo Tamm, who analyzed it; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A name given by Crookes to a dark steel-colored crystalline powder analyzed by Mr. Tamm. Specific gravity 12.5. Composition: Tungsten, 88.05; iron, 5.60; manganese, 0.15; undetermined, 6.20=100. A doubtful species.

tām'-mŷ, tām'-mīn, s. [TAMINE.]

Tām'-mŷ, s. [TOMMY.]

Tammy-norie, s. The auk, the puffin.

"The screech of a Tammie Norie," answered Ochiltree; "I ken the skirl weel."—Scott: Antiquary, ch. vii.

tāmp, v. t. [Fr. tamponner, taper; Prov. tampir.] [TAMPION.]

1. Blasting: To fill up, as a blast-hole; above the charge with dry sand, tough clay, or some other substance, to prevent the explosion taking effect by way of the hole.

2. To force in or down by frequent and somewhat light strokes.

"The iron placed at the top of the gunpowder would be so placed with the object of tamping it."—Pall Mall Gazette.

tām'-pēr, v. i. [The same word as temper (q. v.), but used in a bad sense.]

1. To meddle; to be busy or officious; to have to do with anything without fitness or necessity.

"Vain tampering has but fostered his disease;
'Tis desperate." Cowper: Task, v. 668.

2. To meddle with, especially so as to alter, corrupt, or adulterate; to make corrupt or not genuine.

"The Nicene [Creed] was tampered foully with."—Bp. Taylor: Liberty of Prophesying, § 6.

3. To interfere where one has no business.

"The Governor of Herat has been discovered tampering with the correspondence of the Commission."—Weekly Echo, Sept. 5, 1885.

4. To practice secretly, as by bribery or other unfair or underhand means; to influence, or endeavor to influence, toward a certain course by underhand or unfair means.

"And by subornation, and menacing of, and tampering with witnesses."—Wood: Fusti Oxon., i.

tāmp'-ēr, s. [Eng. tamp; -er.]

1. One who tamps; one who prepares for blasting, by stopping up the hole in which the charge is placed.

2. An instrument used in tamping; a tamping bar or iron.

tām'-pēr-ēr, subst. [Eng. tamper, v.; -er.] One who uses unfair or underhand means in order to influence a person to his own ends.

tāmp'-īng, s. [Eng. tamp; -ing.]

1. Blasting: Filling up a blast-hole, above the charge, so as to direct the force of the explosion laterally and rend the rock.

2. Milit. Mining: Packing with earth, sandbags, &c., that part of the mine nearest to the charge to increase its effectiveness in a given direction.

3. Smelt.: Stopping with clay the issues of a blast-furnace.

4. The material used for any of the above purposes; it may be fragments of stone, earth, sand, or, in some cases, water.

tamping-bar, tamping-iron, s.

Blast.: A bar of copper, brass, or wood, used in driving the tamping upon the charge in a blast-hole. The name tamping-iron is a misnomer.

tamping-machine, s.

Pipe-making: A machine for packing clay or the material for artificial stone into a mold.

tamping-plug, s. A stopper for a hole in which a blasting-charge has been placed.

tām'-pī-ōn, tōm'-pī-ōn, tām'-pŷ-ōn*, s. [Fr. tampon=a bung or stopple, a nasalized form of tapon=a bung or stopple, from taper=to stop with a bung, from Dut. tap=a bung or stopple.]

1. Ordn.: The stopper of a cannon or other piece of ordnance, consisting of a cylinder of wood placed in the muzzle to exclude water or dust; also the wooden bottom for a charge of grape-shot.

2. Music: A plug for stopping closely the upper end of an organ-pipe.

tam-poe, tam-pui, s. [Malay.]

Bot., &c.: The edible fruit of Hedycarpus malayanus, much prized in the Eastern Archipelago.

tām'-poôn, tām'-pōn, s. [TAMPION.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. A tampion.

2. The bung of a vessel.

II. Surg.: A plug or stopper, of rag, sponge, &c., used in stopping hemorrhages.

tām'-tām, tōm'-tōm, s. [Hind., from the sound produced.]

Music:

1. A kind of native drum, used in the East Indies and Western Africa. It is generally made of a hollow cylinder formed of fibrous wood, such as palm-tree, or of earthenware, having each end covered with skin. It is beaten upon with the fingers or open hand, and produces a hollow, monotonous sound.

2. A Chinese gong.

Metall.: An alloy of one part of tin and four parts of copper. When rapidly cooled it is ductile and malleable; but when cooled slowly it is as hard and brittle as glass.

tā-mŷ'-lī-ān, a. [TAMILIAN.]

tā'-mŷs, s. [Mod. Lat., from taminia ura, the berry of a wild climbing plant, growing on a plant, called by the Romans tamnus.]

Bot.: Black-bryony; a genus of Dioscoreaceae. Perianth campanulate, in six deep segments; stigmas three, two-lobed. Berry imperfectly three-celled; seeds few, globose. Known species one or two. Tamus communis is the Common Black bryony. [BLACK-BRYONY.] The young suckers of this plant and of T. cretica are eaten in Greece, but need to be well boiled, else they are purgative and even emetic.

tān, tanne*, v. t. & i. [Fr. tanner, from tan=oak-bark, used for tanning.]

A. Transitive:

I. Lit.: To convert into leather, as the skins of animals, by steeping them in an infusion of oak or other bark, by which they are impregnated with tannin or tannic acid, and thus rendered fine, durable, and in some degree impervious to water.

II. Figuratively:

1. To make brown; to imbrown by exposure to the rays of the sun; to sunburn.

"And therefore did he take a trusty band
To traverse Acarnania's forest wide,
In war well seasoned, and with labors tann'd." Byron: Childe Harold, ii. 69.

*2. To deprive of the freshness of youth; to impair the freshness or beauty of.

"Time . . . whose accidents tan sacred beauty." Shakesp.: Sonnet 115.

3. To flog, to thrash. (Colloq. or slang.)

B. Intransitive:

1. Literally: To get or become tanned; as, This leather tans easily.

2. Fig.: To become tanned or sunburnt.

tān, s. & a. [Fr. tan=oak-bark, used for tanning, from Breton tann=an oak, tan.]

A. As substantive:

1. The bark of the oak, willow, chestnut, larch, and other trees abounding in tannin, bruised and broken by a mill, and used for tanning hides. After being employed for tanning, the tan is used in gardens for making hotbeds, or is pressed and used for fuel.

"His hair is crisp, and black, and long,
His face is like the tan."

Longfellow: Village Blacksmith.

2. A yellowish-brown color, like that of tan.

3. An imbrowning of the skin by exposure to the sun, especially in tropical countries.

B. As adj.: Of the color of tan; resembling tan.

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camel, hēr, thēre; pine, pīt, sīre, sīr, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre. unite, cūr, rūle fūll; trŷ, Sŷrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

tan-balls, s. pl. Spent tan from the tanner's yard, pressed into balls or lumps, which harden on drying and are used as fuel. (Chambers.) tan-bed, s.

Hort.: A bed made of tan; a bark bed or stove.

tan-house, s. A building in which tanners' bark is stored.

tan-mill, s. A mill for breaking up bark for tanning.

tan-pickle, s. The brine of a tan-pit.

tan-pit, s.

1. A sunken vat, in which hides are laid in tan.

2. A bark-bed.

tan-spud, s. An instrument for peeling the bark from oak and other trees.

tan-stove, s. A hot-house with a bark-stove; a bark-stove.

tan-toaster, s. A name for a severe storm; in use in the Isle of Shoals, Maine.

tan-turf, s. The same as TAN-BALLS (q. v.).

tan-vat, s. A vat in which hides are steeped in liquor with tan.

tan-yard, s. An inclosure where the tanning of leather is carried on.

ta-na, s. [Native name.]

Zoöl.: Tupaia tana; a small insectivorous mammal, from the forests of Sumatra and Borneo, living on or near the ground. The body is eight or nine inches long, the color varying in different individuals, but usually of some shade of reddish-brown. A variety, in which the tail is of a golden-yellow, is known as the Golden-tailed Tana.

tān-ā-ċē-tīc, a. [Mod. Lat. tanacet(um) (q. v.); Eng. suff. -ic.] Of, belonging to, existing in, or derived from the Tansy (q. v.).

Chemistry: An acid said to exist in the common tansy. It is crystalline, and is soluble in water and in alcohol.

tān-ā-ċē-tīn, s. [Mod. Latin tanacet(um); -in (Chem.).]

Chemistry: A yellowish-white granular mass extracted from the leaves and flowers of the tansy. It is insoluble in water, slightly soluble in alcohol, and very soluble in ether, has a bitter, sharp taste, and is precipitated by plumbic, ferric, and mercurous salts, not by tannic-acid.

tān-ā-ċē-tūm, s. [Mod. Lat., from Ital. tanacetum=a bed of tansy.] [TANSY.]

Botany: A genus of Compositae, sub-tribe Artemisiæ. Strong-scented herbs, often shrubby below. Leaves alternate, generally much divided; heads solitary or corymbose, subglobose, discoid, yellow; involucre hemispherical, imbricated; receptacle naked; ligulate florets short and trifid or wanting; pappus none, the achenes angled, crowned with a large epigynous disc and having a membranous margin. Found in most continents. Known species about fifty. [TANSY.] Tanacetum tenuifolium, from Kumaon and Western Tibet, is used by the natives for flavoring puddings.

tān-ā-ċī-ūm, subst. [Gr. tanaēkēs=with a long point or edge; akē=a point, an edge.]

Botany: A genus of Crescentiaceæ. Climbing shrubs, often with rooting branches, simple or trifoliate leaves, and white, pink, violet, or scarlet flowers, found in the West Indies and South America. The pulp of Tanacetum jarovia is eaten, and poultices are prepared from it. The fruit of T. albiflorum of Jamaica is also employed for poultices. The berry of T. lilacinum of Guiana is edible. It is used for dyeing cotton cloth and straw furniture.

tān-ā-gēr, s. [From tangara, the Brazilian name of some of the species.]

Ornith.: A popular name for any species of the family Tanagridæ (q. v.). They were formerly classed with Fringillidæ, and have all the essential characters of the Finches, but are so far modified as to feed on soft fruits and insects. They are, for the most part, birds of very brilliant plumage; more than 300 species are known, all American, most of them belonging to the warmer portions of this continent, though some are visitors to the United States.

tān-ā-grā, s. [Mod. Lat.] [TANAGER.]

Ornith.: The type-genus of the family Tanagridæ (q. v.), with twelve species, ranging from Mexico to Bolivia and La Plata.

tān-āg-rī-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. tanagr(a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Ornith.: A family of Fringilliformes, formerly made a sub-family of Fringillidæ, with forty-three genera, almost peculiar to the Neotropical region, only one genus extending into the eastern United States and the Rocky Mountains. Primaries nine;

bill usually conical, sometimes depressed or attenuated, usually more or less triangular at base, and with the cutting edges not much inflected, sometimes toothed or notched; legs short, claws curved.

†tān-ā-grī-næ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. tanagr(a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -inæ.] [TANAGRIDÆ.]

tān-ā-grīne, a. [TANAGRINÆ.] Resembling a tanager; of or belonging to the family Tanagridæ (q. v.).

tān-ā-īs, s. [Lat., from Gr. tanaïs=the Don.]

Zoöl.: Cheliferous Slaters; a genus of Cursorial Isopods, with certain affinities to the Macroura and to the Amphipoda. They have a carapace, the lateral parts of which are very vascular, and are used for respiration. The first pair of legs are converted into chelæ, the six other pairs being simple. The male is dimorphic.

Tān-ċhēl-mī-anş, Tān-que-līn-ī-anş (qu as k), s. pl. [See def.]

Church History: A fanatical sect which arose in the Netherlands, under the leadership of Tanchel or Tanquelin, who, about 1115, proclaimed that he was the Son of God, and caused churches to be erected in his honor. After leading a licentious life for some years, he was killed at Antwerp in 1125. His followers were restored to the church by the instrumentality of St. Norbert, the founder of the Præmonstratensians.

tān-dēm, adv. & s. [A pun on the Lat. tandem=at length, after a certain interval of time.]

A. As adv.: One harnessed behind the other.

"Two emus harnessed tandem."—London Daily Telegraph.

B. As substantive:

1. A term applied to two horses harnessed one in front of the other; the front horse being termed the leader, and the rear one the wheeler.

2. A form of bicycle ridden by two persons, one behind the other.

"Some of the earlier specimens of the front-steering tandem were furnished with four wheels."—Field, May 21, 1887.

tandem-cart, s. A kind of dog-cart drawn by a tandem. [TANDEM, B. 1.]

tāne, pa. par. of v. [TAKEN.]

tāng (1), tongge, s. [Old Dutch tanger=sharp, tart; M. H. G. zanger=sharp, sharp-tasted.]

1. Lit.: A strong taste or flavor, especially a taste of something extraneous to the thing itself.

"It is said of the best oyl that it hath no tast, that is, no tang."—Fuller: Worthies; England.

2. Fig.: Specific flavor or quality; distinctive tinge, taint, or the like; a twang.

"According to that of Euripides, which yet has a tang of prophaneness."—Cudworth: Intell. System, p. 878.

tāng (2), subst. [An imitative word; cf. ting.] A sound, a tone; a twang or sharp sound.

"For she had a tongue with a tang, Would cry to a sailor, Go hang."

Shakesp.: Tempest, ii. 2.

tāng (3), tange, tongge, subst. [Icel. tangi=a spit or projection of land; a tang; töng (genit. tan-gar)=a smith's tongs; tengja=to fasten.]

1. The shank of a knife, chisel, file, &c., which is inserted in the haft.

2. The projecting part of the breech of a musket, which goes into the stock.

3. The part of a sword-blade to which the hilt is fastened.

4. The tongue of a buckle.

tang-chisel, s. A chisel with a tang for insertion in a handle; in contradistinction to a socket-chisel, which has a hollow tang to receive the handle.

tang-fish, s. The seal. (Shetland.) tāng (4), s. [TANGLE.] Various kinds of seaweed (Laminaria digitata, Fucus nodosus).

"Calling it the sea of weeds, or flag, or rush, or tang."—Bp. Richardson: Choice Observations, p. 11.

tāng, v. t. & i. [TANG (2), s.]

A. Trans.: To cause to sound; to utter loudly. (Shakesp.: Twelfth Night, ii. 5.)

B. Intrans.: To ring. (Shakesp.: Twelfth Night, iii. 4.)

†To tang bees: To strike two pieces of metal together, and so to produce a loud sound, to induce a swarm of bees to settle.

tān-gā-lūng, s. [Native name.]

Zoöl.: Viverra tangalunga, from Java. It is about thirty inches in length, of which the tail constitutes one-third. Ground color yellowish-gray, striped and dotted with black.

tān-gēnce, s. [Lat. tangens=touching.] [TANGENT.] A touching; tangency.

†Point of tangence: The point of contact of a tangent line.

tān'-gēn-ċy, subst. [Eng. tangen(t); -cy.] The quality or state of being tangent; a contact or touching.

*†Problem of tangencies: A branch of the geometrical analysis, the general object of which was to describe a circle passing through given points, and touching straight lines or circles given in position, the number of data being always limited to three.

tān'-gēnt, a. & s. [Latin tangens, pr. par. of tango=to touch.]

A. As adj.: Touching; in geometry, touching in a single point; as, a tangent line, tangent curves, &c.

B. As substantive:

1. Geom.: A straight line which meets or touches a circle or curve in one point, and which, being produced, will not cut it. In Euclid (III. 16, Cor.) it is proved that any line drawn at right angles to the diameter of a circle at its extremity is a tangent to the circle.

2. Trig.: The tangent of an arc or angle is a straight line, touching the circle of which the arc is a part at one extremity of the arc, and meeting the diameter passing through the other extremity; or it is that portion of a tangent drawn at the first extremity of an arc, and limited by a secant drawn through the second extremity. The tangent is always drawn through the initial extremity of the arc, and is reckoned positive upward, and consequently, negative downward. The tangent of an arc or angle is also the tangent of its supplement. The arc and its tangent have always a certain relation to each other, and when the one is given in parts of the radius, the other can always be computed by means of an infinite series. Tables of tangents for every arc from 0° to 99°, as well as of sines, cosines, &c., are computed and formed into tables for trigonometrical purposes. Two curves are tangent to each other at a common point, when they have a common rectilinear tangent at this point. A tangent plane to a curved surface is the limit of all secant planes to the surface through the point. The point is called the point of contact. Two surfaces are tangent to each other when they have, at least, one point in common; through which, if any number of planes be passed, the sections cut out by each plane will be tangent to each other at the point. This point is called the point of contact. Another definition is this: Two surfaces are tangent to each other when they have a common tangent plane at a common point. This point is the point of contact.

Tangent.

AAAA, Tangents of the circle; B F, Tangent of the arc B C, or of the angle B D C. B F is also tangent of the supplement B G, of the arc B C, and of the supplement B D G of the angle B D C.

† (1) Artificial tangents: Tangents expressed by logarithms.

(2) Method of tangents: The name given to the calculus in its early period. When the equation of a curve is given, and it is required to determine the tangent at any point, this is called the direct method of tangents, and when the subtangent to a curve at any point is given, and it is required to determine the equation of the curve, this is termed the inverse method of tangents. These terms are synonymous with the differential and integral calculus.

(3) Natural tangents: Tangents expressed by natural numbers.

(4) To go (or fly) off at a tangent: To break off suddenly from one course of action, line of thought, or the like, and go on to something else.

"From that lady his mind wandered, by a natural process, to the dingy counting-house of Dodson and Fogg. From Dodson and Fogg's it flew off at a tangent to the very center of the history of the queer client."—Dickens: Pickwick, ch. xxii.

tangent-compass, s. The same as TANGENT-GALVANOMETER (q. v.).

tangent-galvanometer, s. A form of galvanometer in which the length of the astatic needle employed is so short, in comparison with the diameter of the surrounding copper ring through which the current to be measured is passed, that the intensities of currents may be regarded as proportional to the tangents of the angles of deflection of the needle. The tangents in this case serve as a direct measure of the comparative intensities.

tangent-plane, subst. A plane which touches a curved surface, as a sphere, cylinder, &c.

Navig.: The same as Middle-latitude sailing. [MIDDLE.]

bōll, bōy; pōut, jōwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, þis; sin, aș; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f. -cian, -tian = şan. -tion, -sion = şhūn; -þion, -şion = zhūn. -tious, -cious, -sious = şhūs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bēl, dēl.

tangent-scale, s.

Ordn.: A species of breech-sight for cannon. Its base has a curvature corresponding to the circumference of the breech of the gun, and its face is cut into steps corresponding to angles of elevation. The height for each step is found by multiplying the natural tangent of the elevation in degrees by the distance between the base-ring and muzzle-sight.

tangent-screw, s. An endless screw tangentially attached to the index arm of an instrument of precision, enabling a delicate motion to be given to the arm after it has been clamped to the limb, and permitting angular measurements to be made with greater exactness than could be done were the movement entirely effected by hand.

tăn-găn'-tial (ti as sh), a. [Eng. tangent; -ial.] Of or pertaining to a tangent; in the direction of a tangent.

"Give the heavy planets their tangential motion."—Search: Light of Nature, vol. ii., pt. ii., ch. xxii.

tangential-force, s.

1. The same as CENTRIFUGAL-FORCE.

2. Mech.: A force which acts upon a wheel in the direction of a tangent to the wheel, and this is the direction in which motion is communicated between wheels and pinions or from one wheel to another.

tangential-plane, s. A tangent-plane (q. v.).

tăn-găn'-tial-lŷ (t as sh), adv. [Eng. tangential; -ly.] In a tangential manner; in direction of a tangent.

tăn-gěr'-ine, s. [See def.] An esteemed small-fruited variety of orange from Tangiers.

tăn'-ghîn, s. [TANGHINIA.]

1. The poison of Tanghinia venenifera.

2. That tree itself. [TANGHINIA.]

tăn'-ghîn'-i-a, subst. [From tanghin, the Madagascar name of Tanghinia venenifera. See def.]

Bot.: Tanghin; a genus of Plurimereæ. Corolla salver-shaped, the tube clavate, the throat five-toothed, anthers subsessile, fruit a drupe, with one or two seeds. Only known species, Tanghinia venenifera, called also Cerbera tanghin, the Ordeal-tree (q. v.). Leaves dense, clustered toward the ends of the branches, somewhat thick, about six inches long, alternate, lanceolate, smooth. Flowers in terminal cymes, the tube of the corolla green, hairy, and closed at the mouth by five green scales; lobes of the corolla rose-colored. It is the kernel of the fruit which is the very poisonous part.

tăn-gi-bil'-i-tŷ, s. Eng. tangible; -ity.] The quality or state of being tangible or perceptible to the touch or sense of feeling.

"Tangibility and impenetrability, were elsewhere made by him the very essence of body."—Cudworth: Intell. System, p. 770.

tăn'-gi-ble, a. [Fr., from Lat. tangibilis, from tango=to touch.]

1. Literally:

1. Perceptible to the touch; tactile.

"By this sense [touch] the tangible qualities of bodies are discerned; as hard, soft, smooth, rough, dry, wet, clammy, and the like."—Locke: Elements Nat. Philos., ch. xi.

2. Capable of being touched or grasped.

II. Figuratively:

1. Capable of being possessed or realized; real; as, tangible security.

2. Readily apprehensible by the mind; clear, evident.

"It promised a tangible gain to the peasantry."—Century Magazine, June, 1883, p. 253.

tangible-property, s.

Law: Corporeal property. (Wharton.)

tăn'-gi-ble-ness, s. [Eng. tangible; -ness.] The quality or state of being tangible; tangibility.

tăn'-gi-blŷ, adv. [English tangib(le); -ly.] In a tangible manner; so as to be perceptible to the touch.

tăng'-ie, s. [TANG (4), s.] A water-spirit of the Orkneys, which appeared sometimes as a little horse, at other times as a man covered with seaweed.

Tăn'-giër, s. [See def.]

Geog.: A fortified town of Morocco a short distance southwest of Gibraltar.

Tangier-pea, s.

Bot.: Lathyrus tingitanus.

Tăn'-giër'-ine, s. [TANGERINE.]

tăn'-gle, *tan-gell, v. t. & i. [TANGLE, s.]

A. Transitive:

1. To unite or conjoin together in a confused or involved manner; to ravel; to interweave or interlace, as threads, so as to make it difficult to unravel.

2. To ensnare, to entrap, to catch, to entangle.

"And well th' Impostor knew all lures and arts

That Lucifer e'er taught to tangle hearts."

Moore: Veiled Prophet of Khorassan.

3. To embroil, to embarrass, to involve, to complicate.

"Thei haue bene tangled with a certain folish and canered vile superstition."—Bp. Gardner: Of True Obedience, fol. 6.

B. Intransitive: To be or become entangled or raveled.

tangle-foot, tangle-leg, s. A slang term for whisky.

tăn'-gle, s. [A frequent. from tang=sea-weed; Dan. tang; Sw. tång; Icel. thang=kelp or bladder-wrack; thöngull=sea-weed; Ger. tang=sea-weed.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. One or two species of sea-weed belonging to the genus Laminaria (q. v.). [II. 1.]

"The young stalks of Laminaria digitata and saccharina are eaten under the name of tangle."—Lindley: Vegetable Kingdom.

2. A confused heap or knot of threads or other things interwoven so as not to be easily disengaged.

"He leading, swiftly roll'd

In tangles." Milton: P. L., ix. 632.

3. Any perplexity or embarrassment.

4. A tall, lank person; any long, dangling thing. (Scotch.)

II. Technically:

1. Botany:

(1) Laminaria digitata. It has a broad frond one to five feet long, cut into a variable number of segments, and sporanges in flat patches on the extremities of the digitations.

†(2) Laminaria saccharina. It has a ribbon-shaped frond two to twelve feet long, and sporanges, the situation of which is indicated by a longitudinal brown mark in the center of the frond. Occurring with the former species. [LAMINARIA.]

2. Naut. (pl.): A contrivance used in dredging. In a coarse form it has long been used in the sponge and coral fisheries, consisting of a bar supported on runners, and serving to drag after it a series of masses of hemp, each of which is a sort of mop. The fibers of the hemp entangle the smaller crustaceans, and many of the more minute and delicate forms of marine life, without breaking or injuring them as the dredge is apt to.

tangle-fish, s. [NEEDLE-FISH.]

tangle-picker, s.

Ornithol.: Streptilas interpres, the Turnstone (q. v.).

"It . . . feeds on the smaller crustacea, and the soft-bodied animals inhabiting thin shells, turning over stones, and searching among sea-weed for its food: whence its appropriate Norfolk name of Tangle-picker."—Yarrell: British Birds (ed. 4th), iii. 290.

tangle-wrack, s.

Bot.: The genus Laminaria (q. v.).

tăn'-gled (le as el), a. [Eng. tangl(e); -ed.] Involved; twisted or knit together confusedly; intricate.

"Up springs from yonder tangled thorn,
A stag more white than mountain snow."

Scott: The Chase, xiv.

tăn'-glîng, pr. par. or a. [TANGLE, v.]

tăn'-glîng-lŷ, adv. [Eng. tangling; -ly.] In a tangling manner; so as to tangle, entangle, or embarrass.

tăn'-glŷ, a. [Eng. tangl(e); -y.]

1. Knotted, entangled, intricate.

2. Covered with tangle or sea-weed.

"Panting, with eyes averted from the day, Prone, helpless, on the tangly beach he lay."

Falconer: Shipwreck, iii.

tăn'-grăm, s. [Chinese.] A Chinese toy used sometimes in primary schools as a means of instruction. It consists of a square of thin wood or other material, cut into seven pieces of various shapes, as triangle, square, parallelogram, &c., which pieces are capable of being combined in various ways so as to form a great variety of figures.

tăngs, s. pl. [TONGS.] (Scotch.)

tăngue, s. [A French form of the native name.] [TANREC.]

tăn'-gũm, tăn'-ghăn, tăn'-ghăn, subst. [Thibetan.]

Zoöl.: Equus varius, a variety or sub-variety of the Horse (Equus caballus). It is considered by Colonel Hamilton Smith to be the primeval piebald stock of Thibet. It occurs in Thibet, and, according to Hodgson, in China.

tăn'-i-ër, tăn'-ni-ër, s. [Etym. doubtful.]

Botany: Caladium sagittæfolium. [CALADIUM, EDDOES.]

tăn'-ist, s. [Irish tanaiste=the second in rank, the presumptive or apparent heir to a prince, a lord; tan=a country, region, territory] One of a family from which the chiefs of certain Celtic races were chosen by election; usually applied to the actual holder of the lands and honors, and frequently to his chosen successor. [TANISTRY.]

"The chieftains and the tanists, though drawn from the principal families, were not hereditary, but were established by election."—Hume: Hist. Eng. (an. 1612).

tăn'-ist-rŷ, s. [Eng. tanist; -ry.] A mode of tenure among various Celtic tribes, according to which the tanist or holder of lands or honors had only a life estate in them, and his successor was appointed by election. According to this system the right of succession was hereditary in the family, but elective in the individual. The primitive intention seems to have been that the inheritance should descend to the most worthy of the blood and name of the deceased. This was in reality giving it to the strongest, and the practice often occasioned bloody wars in families.

"The Irish hold their lands by tanistry, which is no more than a personal estate for his life-time that is tanist, by reason he is admitted thereunto by election."—Spenser: State of Ireland.

tă-nite, s. [Etym. doubtful.] The trade name of a cement of emery and some binding material, used as a compound for grinding wheels, disks, laps, and in other forms.

tanite-shaper, subst. A device for shaping and sharpening molding-bits, cutters, saws, and other wood-working tools.

tănk (1), s. [Port. tangue=a tank, a pond. Tank and stank are the same word; Sp. estangue; O. Fr. estanc; Fr. étang; Prov. estanc, stanc; Ital. stagno, from Lat. stagnum=a pool.] [STANK, s., STAGNANT.]

1. A cistern or vessel of large size to contain liquids; specifically—

(1) That part of a tender which contains the water. The tank varies in size, according to the power of the engine.

(2) A reservoir from which the tank of the tender is filled.

(3) A cistern for storing water on board ship.

(4) The cistern of a gas-holder, in which the lower edge of the inverted chamber is beneath the water surface, forming a seal for the gas.

(5) The term is also applied to a chamber or vessel in which a liquid is stored for dispensing or occasional use, as with oil, molasses, vinegar, wine, spirits, and other articles kept in stock, for sale in measured quantities.

2. A reservoir of water for irrigation or other purposes. (East Indies.)

"The tank covers seventy-two acres, and is one of the largest in India."—London Daily Telegraph.

tank-car, s.

Rail. Engin.: A large tank mounted on a platform truck, for carrying petroleum or other liquid.

tank-engine, tank-locomotive, s.

Rail. Engin.: An engine having a tank or tanks enabling it to carry a supply of water sufficient for its own consumption without a tender. Such are used for yard-engines, for side-lines of limited length, and for ascending grades with moderate loads. The boiler and machinery are carried on the driving-wheels, and the variable weight of water and fuel on the tank-truck.

tank-iron, s. Plate-iron, thicker than sheet or stove-pipe iron, but thinner than boiler-plate.

tank-valve, s.

Rail. Engin.: A form of valve used in locomotive water-supply tanks, for admitting water to the discharge-pipe.

tank-vessel, s. A vessel used for the same purpose as a tank-car (q. v.).

tank-worm, s.

Zoöl. (pl.): The Guinea worm in a certain stage of its development, when the young have been set free from the body of their parent and inhabit the "tanks" so common in India. It is supposed that it penetrates the body of bathers when it is very minute.

tănk (2), s. [Native name.]

1. A small East Indian dry measure of about 240 grains weight.

2. A weight for pearls in Bombay of 72 grains. (Simmonds.)

tănk (3), subst. [TANG (3), s.] The end of a file, chisel, &c., which is inserted into the handle; a tang.

tănk (4), s. [Etym. doubtful.]

Bot.: Pastinaca sativa.

tăn'-ka, tăn'-ki-ă, s. [Native Chinese name.]

1. A kind of boat at Canton, Macao, &c., rowed by women. It is about 25 feet long.

2. A woman who rows in such a boat.

fâte, fât, färe, amidst, whât, fâll, father; wê, wêt, hère, camel, hêr, thêre; pine, pît, sîre, sîr, marine; gô, pôť, or, wôre, wôlf, wôrk, whô, sôn; mûte, cûb, cûre, write, cûr, rûle, fûll; trŷ, Sŷrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = â. qu = kw.

tǎn'-kard, s. & a. [Old Fr. tanquard, perhaps formed by metathesis, from Lat. cantharus; Gr. kantharos=a tankard; Old Dut. tanckaert; Irish tancaird.]

A. As substantive:

1. A large vessel for liquors, especially a large drinking vessel with a cover, made of pewter, gold, silver, &c.

2. Specif.: A vessel containing a pint; half tankard, or small tankard, being used for one containing half-a-pint.

B. As adjective: Of or pertaining to a tankard; hence, convivial, festive, jovial. (Milton.)

tankard-bearer, s. A person who, when London was very imperfectly supplied with water, carried water about in large tankards holding two or three gallons, from the conduits and pumps in the streets.

tankard-turnip, s.

Hort., &c.: Brassica rapa oblonga, a variety or sub-variety of turnip rising high above the ground.

tǎn'-kī-a, s. [TANKA.]

tǎnk'-īte, s. [Etymol. doubtful. Sent to Breithaupt under this name.]

Min.: A massive mineral found at Arendal, Norway, and said to be related to chialstolite, but Des Cloizeaux and Pisani (the former from its optical characters, the latter from its chemical composition) refer it to Anorthite (q. v.).

tǎnk'-līng, s. [TANG, v.] A tinkling.

tǎn'-līng, subst. [Eng. tan; dimin. suff. -ling.] One tanned or scorched by the heat of the sun.

tǎn'-nā, thǎn'-nā, thǎn'-a, s. [Hind. thana; Mahratta thane=a station.] A police station; a military post. (East Indies.) tǎn'-nā-ble, adj. [Eng. tan; -able.] Capable of being tanned.

tǎn'-nā-dar, thǎn'-e-dar, s. [Hind. thanedar.] The keeper or commandant of a tanna; a petty police officer. (East Indies.)

tǎn'-nage (ag as īg), subst. [Eng. tan; -age.] The act, operation, or result of tanning; a tanning.

tǎn'-nās-pīd'-īc, a. [Eng. tann(ic); Mod. Latin aspid(ium), and suff. -ic.] A term applied to tannic acid derived from the male fern.

tannaspīd-acid, s.

Chem.: $C_{26}H_{28}O_{11}$ (?). A brown, shining amorphous mass, found in the root of the male fern. It is insoluble in water, ether, oil of turpentine, and fixed oils, but very soluble in strong alcohol and in warm acetic acid. Ferric chloride colors the alcoholic solution green, and on adding ammonia a greenish powder is precipitated.

tǎn'-nāte, s. [Eng. tann(ic); -ate.]

Chem.: A salt of tannic acid.

tǎn'-nē-cor-tē-pī'-nīc, a. [CORTEPINITANNIC.]

tǎn'-nēn-īte, s. [After the Tannenbaum mines, Saxony; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A bright metallic mineral of a tin-white color, crystallizing in the orthorhombic system. Composition: Sulphur, 19.1; bismuth, 62.0; copper, 18.9, the resulting formula being $CuS + Bi_2S_3$.

tǎn'-nēr (1), s. [Eng. tan, v.; -er.] One whose occupation is to tan hides, or convert them into leather by the use of tan.

tanner's bark, s. Bark of various trees used by tanners, specially oak bark. [BARK (2), B. 3.]

tanner's waste, s. Hide-cuttings.

tǎn'-nēr (2), s. [Gypsy tano=little.] A slang expression for sixpence. (Dickens: Martin Chuzzlewit, ch. xxxvii.)

tǎn'-nēr-ý, s. [Eng. tan; -ery.]

1. A place where the operations of tanning are carried on.

2. The art or practice of tanning.

tǎn'-nīc, a. [Eng. tann(in) -ic.] Pertaining to or derived from oak bark.

tannic-acid, s.

Chem.: Tannin. A term applied to certain astringent substances occurring in the bark and other parts of plants, and widely distributed, in one form or another, throughout the vegetable kingdom. They are mostly amorphous, have a rough but not sour taste, a slight acid reaction, and color ferric salts dark blue or green. Their most characteristic reaction is that of forming insoluble compounds with gelatin, solid muscular fiber, skin, &c., which then acquires the property of resisting putrefaction, as in the tanning of leather.

Tannic acid of the Oak:

Chem.: $C_{27}H_{22}O_{17}$. Gallotannic acid, extracted from nut-galls by long maceration of the powdered substance with a mixture of four parts of ether and one part of alcohol. It forms a slightly yellowish, porous mass, very soluble in water, less so in alcohol, slightly soluble in ether, reddens litmus, and possesses a pure astringent taste. It forms neutral and basic salts, the latter absorbing oxygen from the air and becoming brown.

tǎn'-nī-ēr, s. [TANIER.]

tǎn'-nī-gē-nām'-īc, a. [Eng. tanni(c); Gr. gennaō=to produce, and Eng. amic.] Derived from or containing tannic acid and ammonia.

tannigenamic-acid, s. [GALLAMIC-ACID.]

tǎn'-nīn, subst. [Fr., from Mod. Lat. tanninum.] [TAN, TANNIC-ACID.]

tǎn'-nīng, pr. par., a. & s. [TAN, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As substantive:

I. Lit.: The art, practice, or process of converting raw hides and skins into leather by combining with the substance of the skin any other compound which has the property of rendering it imputrescible and elastic. The agent most generally employed is a soluble vegetable extract termed tannin, which forms insoluble compounds with the albumen, gluten, gelatin, and other components of the skin. Another class of agents which fortify the fibrous portions of skins against the joint attack of warmth, air, and moisture are minerals, which seem to act as preservative salts on the gelatino-fibrous structure of the skin. Such are alum and salt, and copers. The larger and heavier skins, as those of buffaloes, oxen, or the like, are technically known as hides; those of smaller animals, as of sheep, calves, &c., are skins. The skins are first stripped of the hair, wool, and fleshy parts by steeping in pits containing lime-water of various strengths. They are then washed in water, scraped to get rid of adhering lime, the ears and projecting parts cut off, and are then ready for the tan-pits—wooden-lined vats, whose tops are level with the ground. Into these the skins and the ground bark, or ooze previously extracted therefrom, are put. The skins are usually placed in horizontal layers, but are sometimes suspended vertically. In the process of handling, the hides are taken out with blunt-pointed, long-handled hooks, placed one over another, on a sloping rack over an adjacent pit, and permitted to drain for one or two hours. It is common to put the skins at first into nearly spent ooze, and transfer them successively to stronger oozes. Those in which the tanning is effected are called handler-liquor; stronger oozes, used for giving the bloom on the surface, are termed layer-liquor.

II. Figuratively:

1. Appearance or hue of a brown color produced on the skin by the action of the sun.

2. A thrashing, a flogging. (Slang.) tǎn'-nīn-gēn'-īc, a. [Eng. tannin; Gr. gennaō, and suff. -ic.] Containing tannic acid.

tanningenic-acid, s. [CATECHINE.]

tǎn'-nōm'-ē-tēr, s. [Eng. tann(in); o connect., and meter.] A hydrometer for determining the strength of tanning liquor.

tǎn'-rēc, s. [Native name.]

Zoöl.: Centetes ecaudatus, a small nocturnal insectivorous mammal from Madagascar and the neighboring islands. It is about fifteen inches long, of which nearly one-third is occupied by the elongated head; the body is covered with bristles, hairs, and spines, the latter forming a sort of collar round the neck. General color, tawny; in the young there are said to be longitudinal yellow streaks, which disappear with age. They feed principally on earth worms, for which they root with their pointed snouts like pigs. Their flesh is said to resemble that of the sucking-pig, but to have a musky odor. [CENTETES, STREAKED-TANREC.]

tǎn'-şý, *tǎn'-zeý, s. [Etym. unknown (Littre), doubtful (Sir J. Hooker); O. Fr. athanasie; Fr. tanacée, tanaisie: Low Lat. athanasia, the name under which the tansy was sold in the shops in Lyle's time; Gr. athanasia = immortality, a privative, and thanatos = death. (Prior.)]

1. Bot.: Tanacetum vulgare. It is about one to three feet high, has bipinnatifid, incised, serrate leaves, and flowers in a terminal corymb. It is found in waste places, but often doubtfully wild. The whole plant is bitter and aromatic. It is sometimes used in domestic economy as an ingredient in puddings, omelets, &c., or for garnishing dishes; and medicinally as an anthelmintic and a febrifuge.

2. Cook.: A favorite dish of the seventeenth century, and even later, made of eggs, cream, rose water, sugar, and the juice of herbs, as endive, spinach, sorrel, tansy, and baked with butter in a shallow pewter dish.

¶ Wild Tansy:

Bot.: (1) Potentilla anserina. So named because the leaves are much divided like those of the tansy. Called also Goose tansy. (2) Agrimonia eupatoria. (Britten & Holland.) tǎnt, s. [TAINT.] A small red spider.

tǎn-tā'-lī-ān, adj. [TANTALUS.] Tantalizing, unprofitable.

"Get much tantalian wealth."

Davies: Witte's Pilgrimage, p. 24.

tǎn-tǎl'-īc, adj. [Eng. tantal(um); -ic.] Contained in or derived from tantalum (q. v.).

tantalīc-acid, s. [TANTALIC-OXIDE.]

tantalīc-chloride, s.

Chem.: $TaCl_5$. Obtained as a yellow sublimate when a mixture of tantalīc oxide and charcoal is ignited in a stream of chlorine gas. It is decomposed by water yielding hydrochloric acid and hydrated tantalīc oxide. Heated to 144°, it volatilizes, and at 221° melts to a yellowish liquid.

tantalīc-ocher, s.

Min.: An oxide of tantalum of a brownish color, said to occur on crystals of tantalite at Pennikojä, Somero, Finland.

tantalīc-oxide, s.

Chem.: Ta_2O_5 . Produced by burning tantalum in the air. The anhydrous oxide is a white powder, varying in density from 7.02 to 8.26, and is insoluble in all acids. Hydrated tantalīc oxide, or tantalīc acid, is obtained by adding water to an aqueous solution of potassium tantalate. It is a snow-white, bulky powder, soluble in hydrochloric and hydrofluoric acids.

tǎn-tā'-lī'-nā, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. tantal(us); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -inae.]

Ornith.: In some classifications a sub-family of Ardeidae.

tǎn'-tāl-īşe, v. t. [TANTALIZE.]

tǎn'-tāl-īsm, s. [TANTALIZE.] A punishment like that of Tantalus; a teasing or tormenting by the hope or near approach of that which is desired, but which is not attainable; tantalization.

"A lively representation of a person lying under the torments of such a kind of tantalism."—Addison: Spectator, No. 90.

tǎn'-tāl-īte, subst. [Eng. tantal(um); suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: An orthorhombic mineral of rare occurrence, found in granitic rocks rich in albite or oligoclase. Hardness, 6-6.5; specific gravity, 7-8; luster, metallic; color, black; streak, reddish-brown to black; opaque, brittle. Composition: A tantalate of the protoxides of iron and manganese, part of the tantalīc-acid being sometimes replaced by oxide of tin, forming a stanno-tantalate. Formula ($FeOMnO$), TaO_5 .

tǎn-tā'-lī-ūm, s. [TANTALUM.]

tǎn-tāl-ī-zā'-tion, s. [Eng. tantaliz(e); -ation.] The act of tantalizing; the state of being tantalized.

"Rozinante's pains and tantalizations in this night's round."—Gayton: Festivous Notes.

tǎn'-tāl-īze, v. t. [Formed from the proper name Tantalus, with suff. -ize (Fr. -iser; Lat. -izo; Gr. tantaliser.] To tease or torment by presenting something desirable to the view, but continually frustrating the expectations by keeping it out of reach; to excite expectations or fears which will not be realized; to tease, to torment.

"I should otherwise have felt exceedingly tantalized with living under the walls of so great a city full of objects of novelty without being able to enter it."—Cook: Third Voyage, bk. vi., ch. ix.

tǎn'-tāl-īz-ēr, s. [Eng. tantaliz(e); -er.] One who tantalizes.

"I made, however, no discovery of my determination to this tantalizer."—Wakefield: Memoirs, p. 227.

tǎn'-tāl-īz-īng, pr. par. & a. [TANTALIZE.]

A. As pr. par.: (See the verb.)

B. As adj.: Teasing or tormenting by presenting to the view something unattainable; tormenting.

"In this tantalizing situation the Gloucester continued for near a fortnight, without being able to fetch the road."—Anson: Voyages, bk. ii., ch. ii.

tǎn'-tāl-īz-īng-lý, adv. [Eng. tantalizing; -ly.] In a tantalizing manner; so as to tantalize; by tantalizing.

tǎn'-tā-lūm, subst. [TANTALUS. Named from the difficulty with which it was obtained.]

Chem.: A pentad metallic element, symbol. Ta, atomic weight 182, discovered, in 1803, by Ekeberg, in the minerals tantalite and yttrotantalite. The metal is obtained by heating the fluotantalate of potassium or sodium with metallic sodium in a covered iron crucible, cooling, and washing out the soluble salts

Tansy.

1. Male flower; 2. Fruit;
3. Involucral bract;
4. Female flower.

bōil, bōy; pōut, jōwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, aş; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f. -cian, -tian = şan. -tion, -sion = şün; -tion, -şion = zhün. -tious, -cious, -sious = şüş. -ble, -dle, &c. = bel, del with water. It is a black powder, insoluble in sulphuric, hydrochloric, nitric, or even in nitrohydrochloric acid, but is slowly dissolved in warm aqueous hydrofluoric acid, very rapidly when nitric acid is present. When heated in the air, it burns with a bright light, being converted, though with difficulty, into tantalic oxide.

Tăn'-tạ-lũs, s. [Lat., from Gr. Tantalos.]

1. Class. Myth.: A king of Lydia, and son of Jupiter, who, for an offense committed against his father, was condemned to stand in the lower world up to the chin in water, which constantly eluded his lip as often as he attempted to quench the thirst that tormented him. Over his head grew all kinds of fruits; but whenever he reached forth his hands to take them, the wind scattered them to the clouds.

2. Ornith.: A genus of Wading Birds, the type of the old sub-family Tantalinae, variously placed in different classifications. According to Wallace it belongs to the Ciconiidae, with five species from the Ethiopian, Oriental and Neotropical regions, and the southeast of North America. The genus is akin to Ibis, but with a stronger bill. One of the species, Tantalus* (= †Ibis = Plegadis) falcinellus, the Gloomy Ibis, is an occasional visitor to temperate Europe. (Yarrell: Brit. Birds, ed. 4th, iv. 213.)

Tantalus' cup, s. A philosophical toy, consisting of a siphon so adapted to a cup that, the short leg being in the cup, the long leg may go down through the bottom of it. The siphon is concealed within the figure of a man, whose chin is on a level with the bend of the siphon. Hence, as soon as the water rises up to the chin of the image, it begins to subside, so that the figure, like Tantalus in the fable, is unable to quench its thirst.

Tantalus' Cup.

tăn'-tạ-mount, v. i. [TANTAMOUNT, a.] To be tantamount or equivalent.

"That which in God's estimate may tantamount to a direct undervaluing."—Bp. Taylor: Episcopacy Asserted, § 31.

tăn'-tạ-mount, tan-ta-mont, a. [Fr. tant (Lat. tantus)=so much, as much; Eng. amount.] Equivalent in value, force, signification, or effect.

"Whenever the Liberals bring forward a motion regarded by all sides as tantamount to a vote of want of confidence."—London Daily Telegraph.

tăn'-tạ-mount-ing-lỹ, adv. [TANTAMOUNT.] Equivalently; in effect.

"Tantamountingly to give her the lie."—Fuller: Church Hist., II. ii. 28.

tăn-tĩ-tỹ, s. [QUANTITY.]

tăn-tiv'-ỹ, adv. & s. [From the note of a hunting-horn.]

A. As adv.: Swiftly, speedily.

B. As substantive:

1. A rapid, violent gallop.

2. A mixture of haste and violence; a rush, a torrent.

"Sir, I expected to hear from you in the language of the lost goat, and the prodigal son, and not in such a tantivy of language."—Cleveland.

3. An adherent of the Court in the time of Charles II.; a royalist. (Probably from the fox-hunting habits of the country squires of that period.)

"Collier . . . was a Tory of the highest sort, such as in the cant of his age was called a tantivy."—Macaulay: Essays; Comic Dramatists of the Restoration.

¶ To ride tantivy: To ride with great speed.

tăn-tiv'-ỹ, v. i. [TANTIVY, adv.] To hurry off; to go off in a hurry.

"Where are they gone tantivying?"—Mad. D'Arblay: Camilla, bk. iii., ch. viii.

tânt'-lĩng, s. [Based on tantalize (q. v.).] One seized with the hope of things unattainable.

Tăn'-trạ, s. [Sans., from tan=to believe.]

Hind. Sacred Lit. (pl.): Compositions, great in number and in some cases extensive, always assuming the form of a dialogue between Siva and his bride in one of her many forms, but chiefly as Uma and Parvati, in which the goddess asks her consort for directions how to perform certain ceremonies, and with what prayers and incantations they should be accompanied. In giving her information, he warns her that it must on no account be divulged to the profane. The Tantrikas, or followers of the Tantras, consider them a fifth Veda, and attribute to them equal antiquity and superior authority. Prof. Horace Hayman Wilson believed that portions of them are older than the Paranas, and that the system originated in the early ages of Christianity. They were composed chiefly in Bengal and Eastern India. The Saktas are great supporters of the Tantras. [SAKTA.]

Tăn'-trắm, s. [Eng. tantr(a); -ism.] The doctrine of the Tantras.

Tăn'-trĩ-kạ, s. [Sans., &c.]

Hinduism: A follower of the Tantras.

tăn'-trũm, s. [Etym. doubtful.] A burst of ill-humor; a fit of passion; a display of temper. (Generally in the plural.) (Colloq.)

"He has been in strange humors and tantrums all the morning."—Lytton: My Novel, bk. xi., ch. ii.

tăn'-tỹ, s. [Hind. tánt.]

Weaving: The Hindu loom, consisting of bamboo beams for the warp and cloth, a pair of heddles moved by loops, in which the big toes are inserted, a needle which answers as a shuttle, and a lay.

tăn'-ỹ-pũs, s. [Gr. tanyous, tanaupous=long striding, long-legged; tanyō=to stretch, and pous=a foot.]

1. Entom.: A genus of Tipulidæ. Antennæ with fourteen articulations in both sexes, the last but one very long in the males, all the others nearly globular.

2. Palæont.: A species occurs in the Purbeck beds.

tăn'-ỹ-sĩp'-těr-a, s. [Gr. tanysepteros=having spreading wings: tanyō=to spread, and pteron=a wing.]

Ornith.: A genus of Alcedinidæ, with fourteen species, from the Moluccas, New Guinea, and North Australia. Bill rather short, somewhat thick, straight, acute; nostrils oval; tail graduated, the two middle feathers the longest.

tăn'-ỹs'-tỏ-mạ, s. [Greek tanyō=to stretch out, and stoma=a mouth.]

Entom.: A tribe of Diptera (q. v.), with several families. The antennæ consist apparently of three joints, but often with indications of articulation in the third joint, and with a terminal bristle; the palpi of not more than two joints, and the mouth usually perfect. The larvæ have a more or less distinct head, and produce free pupæ.

tăn'-ỹ-stỏmẻ, s. [TANYSTOMA.] Any dipterous insect of the tribe Tanystoma (q. v.). The gadfly is a familiar example.

tăn'-zĩ-mắt, s. [Arab., pl. of tansim=a regulation.] The name given to the organic laws, constituting the first contribution toward constitutional government in Turkey, published in 1844 by the Sultan Abdul Medjid.

Tă'-ỏ-ỉm, Tă'-ỏn-ỉm, s. [See def.]

Compar. Relig.: One of the three religions of China. Its founder, Laotse, lived, according to tradition, in the sixth century B. C. Tao is a word meaning "way." It would seem that Tao represented the course which Laotse thought a man should pursue in order to overcome evil. The whole teaching was vague and unsatisfactory; but its followers made a great advance on those that had preceded them, by believing firmly that ultimately good would gain the victory over evil, and by insisting that good should be returned for evil, as the sure way to overcome it. The head of the body was a sort of patriarch, who had the power of transmitting his dignity and office to a member of his own family, and the descendants of the first are said to have held the office for centuries. Tao was afterward personified, and regarded as the first being of the universe. The Taoists attributed to him eternity and invisibility; but they do not seem to have regarded him as being in any way able to assist or comfort his followers. All they had to do was to contemplate him and his virtues, and to strive to keep in the "way." When Taoism appears as a definite factor in the history of China, in the third century B. C., it appears as a congeries of superstitions; belief in the manifestations of spirits, alchemy, astrology, searching for the herb of immortality, and the sublimation of the body so as to render it ethereal. Taoism was largely modified by Buddhism, some of the doctrines and practices of which it adopted; but it still adheres to its old superstitions, though in its treatises it enjoins much of the Confucian and the Buddhistic morality.

Tă'-ỏ-ỉst, Tă'-ỏn-ỉst, a. & s. [Eng. Tao(ism), Taon(ism); -ist.]

A. As adj.: Of or belonging to Taoism (q. v.).

ta-pălp'-ite, s. [After the Sierra de Tapalpa, Mexico, where found; suff. -ite (Min.); Ger. tellurwismuthsilber.]

Min.: Supposed to be a sulpho-telluride of bismuth and silver, but its exact composition has not yet been determined. Structure, granular; specific gravity, 7.803; luster, metallic; color, gray, tarnishes easily. An analysis by Rammelsberg yielded: Sulphur, 3.32; tellurium, 24.10; bismuth, 48.50; silver, 23.35=99.27.

ta-pây-ăx'-in, s. [Native name.]

Zoöl.: Phrynosoma orbiculare, a toad-like lizard, about six inches long, from the hill-country of Central Mexico. There are eight sharp radiating spines on the back of the head, and rows of scales keeled and spined on the flanks. General color, a dull sand-tint above; yellowish beneath.

tāpe, *tappe, s. [A. S. tæppe=a tape, a fillet; closely allied to tæppet=a tippet, and borrowed from Lat. tapete=cloth, hangings, tapestry (q. v.).]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. A narrow fillet or band; a narrow linen or cotton fabric, twilled or plain, white or colored, used for strings and the like.

"Will you buy any tape, or lace for your cap,

My dainty duck, my dear-a?"

Shakesp.: Winter's Tale, iv. 2.

2. A tape-line (q. v.).

3. A narrow band of paper on which messages are recorded by a telegraph apparatus.

4. Spirituous or fermented liquor. (Slang.)

II. Printing:

1. One of the traveling-bands which hold and conduct the sheet of paper in a machine. The nippers take the sheet from the feed-board, and the fly, taking it from the tapes, delivers it on to the heap.

2. A similar band in a paper-folding machine.

tape-carrier, s. A tool-holder, like a frame-saw, in which a corundum tape is mounted, to be used in cutting or filing.

tape-fuse, subst. A long, flexible, ribbon-shaped fuse, containing a composition which burns with great rapidity.

tape-line, tape-measure, s. A ribbon of tape or other material winding upon an axis inside a case. They are made of linen or steel, from ten to 100 feet long, and divided into feet, inches, and subdivisions of an inch.

tape-primer, subst. A narrow strip of flexible material, usually paper, containing small charges of fulminating composition at short and equal intervals, apart, and covered with a waterproof composition.

tāpe, v. t. [TAPE, s.] To make go a great way; to use sparingly; to measure carefully.

"And ye s'all hae my skill and knowledge to gar the siller gang fur—I'll tape it out weel."—Scott: Heart of Mid-Lothian, ch. xii.

ftāpe'-ışm, s. [TAPISM.]

ftāpe'-ist, s. [TAPIST.]

tāp'-en, a. [Eng. tap(e), s.; -en.] Made of tape. "Burst its tapen bonds."—Reade: Never Too Late to Mend, ch. xxv.

tā'-pēr, s. & a. [A. S. tapor, taper; Irish tapar; Wel. tampr.]

A. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. A small wax-candle, usually having a long wick with such a covering of wax as to allow the taper to be coiled; a small lighted wax candle; a small light.

"To guide his dangerous tread, the tapers gleam." Wordsworth: Descriptive Sketches.

2. Tapering form; gradual diminution of thickness in an elongated object; that which possesses a tapering form.

"In shape it differs somewhat from the Whitehead, being not only a third longer, but having a blunter head and a greater length of taper aft."—London Daily Telegraph.

II. Bot.: Verbascum thapsus. [HIGTAPER.]

B. As adjective:

I. Ord. Lang.: Long and becoming regularly more slender toward the point; tapering toward one end.

"With ample forehead, and with spreading horns, Whoso taper tops refulgent gold adorns."

Pope: Homer's Iliad, x. 350.

II. Bot.: Terete (q. v.).

taper-file, s. A file which is rectangular in section, and whose thickness and width gradually decrease toward the point.

taper-pointed, a.

Bot.: Acuminate (q. v.).

taper-vice, s. A vice whose cheeks are arranged to grasp objects whose sides are not parallel.

tā'-pēr, v. i. & t. [TAPER, s.]

A. Intransitive:

1. To become gradually slenderer; to diminish in one direction; to become gradually less in diameter.

"Around the tapering top a dove they tye."

Pitt: Virgil's Æneid, v.

*2. To diminish; to grow gradually less.

B. Trans.: To cause to taper; to make gradually smaller, especially in diameter.

"I never saw any single tree-masts so big in the body, and so long, and yet so well tapered."—Dampier: Voyages (an. 1687).

tā'-pēred, a. [Eng. taper; -ed.] Provided with tapers; lighted with a taper or tapers.

tā'-pēr-īng, pr. par. or a. [TAPER, v.] Becoming gradually smaller in diameter toward one end; gradually diminishing toward a point.

tā'-pēr-īng-lŷ, adv. [Eng. tapering; -ly.] In a tapering manner.

tā'-pēr-nēss, s. [Eng. taper; -ness.] The quality or state of being tapering; tapering form.

"A Corinthian pillar has a relative beauty, dependent on its taperness and foliage."—Shenstone: On Taste.

tā'-pēr-wīse, adv. [Eng. taper; -wise.] In a tapering manner; taperingly.

"It groweth taperwise, sharpe and pointed in the top."—P. Holland: Pliny, bk. xvi., ch. xvi.

tāp'-ēs, s. [Gr. tapēs=a carpet, a rug.]

Zoöl & Palæont.: A genus of Veneridæ (q. v.); outline of shell ovate, oblong, umbones turned forward, margin smooth, siphonal fold deep and rounded. The animal is eaten in North America and on the coast of Europe. About eighty recent species, widely distributed, from low water to 100 fathoms. Fossil six, from the Pliocene of Europe.

tāp'-ēs-trie, a. [Eng. tapestry; -ed.] Furnished or hung with tapestry.

"In vain on gilded roof they fall,

And lightened up a tapestried wall."

Scott: Lady of the Lake, vi. 23.

tāp'-ēs-trŷ, *tap-es-trie, *tap-es-trye, *tap-is-trie, *tap-is-try, subst. [A corrupt. of French tapisserie, from tapisser=to furnish with tapestry; tapis=tapestry, from Low Lat. tapecius=tapestry, from Lat. tapete=cloth, hangings; Gr. tapēs (genit. tapētos)=a carpet; Sp. tapiz=tapestry; Italian tapezzeria=tapestry.]

Fabric: A kind of woven hangings of wool or silk, frequently raised and enriched with gold and silver, representing figures of men, animals, historical subjects, &c. The term is of somewhat indefinite meaning, and the purpose equally indeterminate. It was originally intended for hangings, to hide the wall, or make a screen or curtain. Hand tapestry is embroidered by the needle, woollen or silken threads being worked into the meshes of a fabric. The term is also applied to a variety of woven fabrics having a multiplicity of colors in their design, but having no other characteristic of true tapestry.

"The tapestry, the bedding, the wainscots were soon in a blaze."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xxiii.

¶ The art of making tapestry was known to most of the ancient nations. The hangings and walls of the Jewish tabernacle were a kind of tapestry, some made by the needle and some woven (Exod. xxvi. 1, 31, 36, xxxv. 35). There was a kind of tapestry in the houses of the Anglo-Saxon chiefs. That of the ordinary type was introduced, or reintroduced, into Europe by the Saracens, and those Frenchmen who made it were called Sarazinois. The factory at Arras was so celebrated from the fourteenth to the sixteenth century that the name of the town came to be used for the fabric. [ARRAS, GOBELIN.] The art reached high perfection in Flanders in the fifteenth century. In the reign of Henry VIII. tapestry-weaving was introduced into England, and a manufactory was commenced at Mortlake in 1619. At first tapestry was used chiefly to decorate churches, but was afterward employed to beautify the mansions of the aristocracy. The scenes represented have historic interest, from the vivid representation which they present of contemporary life. [BAYEUX-TAPESTRY.] The art is now more common in the East than the West, the use of tapestry having been superseded in Europe by painting, the papering of walls, &c., but the celebrated manufactory in the Avenue des Gobelins, Paris, which became a State institution in the reign of Louis XIV., still flourishes, and the tapestry produced there is as superior to the Bayeux tapestry as a picture by Rubens is to the crude outline drawings of early Egyptian art.

tapestry-carpet, s. A two-ply carpet in which the warp is first printed and then woven.

tāp'-ēs-trŷ, v. t. [TAPESTRY, s.] To adorn or hang with or as with tapestry.

tāp'-ēt, *tap-ette, *tap-ite, s. [Lat. tapete.] [TAPESTRY, s.] Worked or figured stuff; tapestry, carpet.

tāp'-ē-tî, s. [Native name.]

Zoöl.: Lepus brasiliensis, found throughout Brazil, and on various parts of the Andes in Bolivia and Peru.

tāp'-ēt-lēss, a. [TAP (3), s.] Not having a tap or head; hence, heedless, foolish. (Scotch.) ta-pē'-tūm, s. [Mod. Lat., from Lat. tapete=a carpet, tapestry.]

1. Anat.: Certain cross fibers of the corpus callosum spreading outward on the roof of the lateral ventricles of the cerebrum.

2. Compar. Anat.: A shining spot on the outside of the optic nerve in the eyes of certain animals, which is owing to the absence of the pigmentum nigrum occasioning the reflection of a portion of the rays from the membrana ruyschiana. Its use appears to be to cause a double impression on the retina, and thus add to the intensity of vision. It may be observed distinctly in the eye of the common cat.

tāpe'-wōrm, s. [Eng. tape, and worm.]

1. Zoöl.: An intestinal worm, Tænia solium, in form somewhat resembling tape. Its length is from five to fifteen yards, and its breadth from two lines at the narrowest part to four or five at the other or broader extremity. At the narrow end is the head, which is terminated anteriorly by a central rostellum, surrounded by a crown of small recurved hooks, and behind them four suckorial depressions; then follow an immense number of segments, each full of microscopic ova. The segments are capable of being detached when mature, and reproducing the parasite. There is no mouth; but nutrition appears to take place through the tissues of the animal, as also derive nourishment from the sea-water in which they float. The digestive system consists of two tubes or lateral canals, extending from the anterior to the posterior end of the body, and a transverse canal at the summit of each joint. The tapeworm lives in the small intestines of man, affixing itself by its double circle of hooks. When the reproductive joints or proglottides become mature, they break off and are voided with the stools. They may get into water, or may be blown about with the wind, till some of them are at length swallowed by the pig, and produce a parasite called Cysticercus cellulosæ, which causes measles in the pig. When the measly pork is eaten by man, a tapeworm, the ordinary Tænia solium, appears in his intestines. This species mainly affects the poor, who are the chief pork-eaters. Called more fully the Pork Tapeworm. The Beef Tapeworm, Tænia mediocanellata, has no coronet of hooks on the head. The segments are somewhat larger than in the ordinary tapeworm. It is fifteen to twenty-three feet long. The cysticercus of this species forms measles in the ox, and is swallowed by man in eating beef. It chiefly affects the rich. The Broad Tapeworm, Bothriocephalus latus, is twenty-five feet long by nearly an inch broad, and chiefly affects the inhabitants of Switzerland, Russia, and Poland.

2. Pathol.: Sometimes a person infested by a tapeworm experiences no inconvenience, and never suspects the existence of the parasite till segments of it are passed. Or there may be continual craving for food, debility, pain in the stomach, irritability of the bladder, itching about the nose and anus, vertigo, noises in the ears, faintness, restlessness and emaciation. [HYDATIDS.]

ftapeworm-shaped, a.

Bot.: Long, cylindrical, and contracted in various places, like the tapeworm.

tāph-ō-nŷc'-tēr-īs, s. [Gr. taphos=a tomb, and nykteris=a bat.] [TAPHOZOUS.]

bōil, bōy; pōut, jōwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, t̃his; sin, .aş; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f. -cian, -tian = şan. -tion, -sion = şhün; t̃ion, -şion = zhün. -tious, -cious, -sious = şhüş. -ble, -dle, &c. = beł, deł.

tāph-ō-zō-ūs, s. [Gr. taphos=a tomb, and zōō=to live. So named by Geoffroy because he discovered the type species, Taphozous perforatus, in the chambers of the Pyramids. [TOMB-BAT.] The other species share its fondness for dark places.]

Zoöl.: A genus of Bats, belonging to the group Emballonuræ of the family Emballonuridae, from the Ethiopian, Oriental, and Australian regions, with ten species ranging into Egypt and Palestine. Most of these bats have a peculiar glandular sac between the angles of the lower jaw; it is always more developed in males than in females, which, in some species, do not possess any trace of it, though in the males of the same species it may be quite distinct. In Taphozous melanopogon, from India and the East Indies, it is absent from both sexes. In the seven species forming the sub-genus Taphozous, a small band of integument passes from the inferior surface of the fore-arm, and forms, with the wing-membrane, a small pouch; in the other three species (forming the sub-genus Taphonycteris) this pouch is absent.

tāph-rēn-chy-ma, s. [Gr. taphros=a ditch, and engchyma=infusion.]

Bot.: [BOTHRENCYMA.]

tāp-in-age (age as Ig), s. [Fr. tapinois=by stealth.] A lurking or skulking. (Gower: C. A., v.)

tāp-i-ō-ca, s. [The Brazilian Indian name.]

Food Products: The powdered root or rhizome of Manihot utilissima (Jatropha manihot). The root, which is about thirty pounds in weight, and is full of a poisonous juice, is washed, rasped, or rasped and grated, to a pulp. This, being well bruised and thoroughly washed, is heated on iron plates, by which process the poison is drawn off. The powder, when dry, consists of pure starch, and is baked into bread by the natives of Central America. In the United States and Europe it is generally made into puddings, and forms a light and nutritious diet. Pearl tapioca is made from prepared grain.

tapioca-starch, s.

Chem.: Purified cassava flour (q. v.). The granules somewhat resemble sago starch in form, but are smaller. They are round at one end, and truncated at the other. The hilum, which is situated at the round end of the granule, is, in some, a slit, in others a distinct cross. Like sago, it is frequently added to the cheaper varieties of arrowroot.

Tapioca-starch.

tā-pī-ō-lite, s. [After the name of an ancient Finnish mythological subject.]

Min.: A tetragonal mineral occurring in a pegmatitic granite near Sukula, Tammela, Finland. Hardness, 6.0; specific gravity 7.35; luster, adamantine to metallic; color, pure black. Composition: Tantalum acid, 83.1; protoxide of iron, 16.9=100, which corresponds with the formula $5\text{FeO}, 4\text{TaO}_5$.

tā-pīr, s. [From the French form of the native Brazilian name.]

Zoöl.: Any individual of the genus Tapirus (q. v.). The South American tapir (Tapirus americanus) is about the size of a small ass, but more stoutly built, legs short, snout prolonged into a proboscis, but destitute of the finger-like process which is present in the elephant's trunk. The skin of the neck forms a thick rounded crest on the nape, with a short, stiff mane.

It is plentiful throughout South America, ranging from the Isthmus of Darien to the Straits of Magellan. The color is a uniform deep brown, but the young are marked with yellow stripes and spots. There is another American species inhabiting the Cordilleras; the back is covered with hair, and the nasal bones are more elongated, on which account Gill has given it generic rank. [TAPIRUS.] The Malayan tapir (T. malayanus) is rather larger than the American species, and has a somewhat longer proboscis; it is maneless. The color is glossy black, with the back, rump, and sides white, the two colors being distinctly marked off from each other without any graduation. Tapirs inhabit deep recesses of forests, delighting in water, and feeding on young shoots of trees, fruits, and other vegetable substances. They are inoffensive, never attacking man, and are easily tamed. Their flesh is eaten, but is somewhat dry, and their hides are made into leather.

tā-pīr-a-vūs, s. [Mod. Lat. tapir (us), and Lat. avus=an ancestor.]

Palæont.: A genus of Tapiridae (q. v.), from the Miocene of North America.

tā-pīr-i-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. tapir (us); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

1. Zoöl.: A family of Perissodactyla (q. v.), with a single genus. [TAPIRUS.]

2. Palæont.: There are several fossil genera, commencing in the Eocene.

tā-pīr-ō-dōn, s. [Eng., &c. tapir, and Gr. odous (genit. odontos)=a tooth.]

Palæont.: A genus of Mammals having teeth like those of the tapir. One species, from the Red Crag.

tā-pīr-ōld, a. [Eng. tapir; -oid.] Allied to the tapir or the tapir family.

"In France it is associated with two tapir genera."—Dawkins: Early Man in Britain, ch. ii.

tā-pīr-ūs, s. [Mod. Lat., from tapir (q. v.).]

1. Zoöl.: A genus of Tapiridae, from the Neotropical and Oriental sub-regions. Nose prolonged into a short, movable proboscis, skin very thick and covered with close, short hair, neck furnished with a kind of stiff mane; tail very short, ears small, erect, and pig-like; four toes on the fore feet, three on the hind feet, separate, and ending in nail-like hoofs; skull pyramidal, as in the hog, with the nasal bones much arched for the muscles of the proboscis. The apparent anomaly of classing animals with four toes with the Perissodactyla is explained by the fact that one of the toes (the fifth digit) is non-functional, and does not touch the ground. Authorities differ greatly as to the number of species from America, one of which has been separated generically by Gill under the name of Elasmognathus. Tapirus malayanus is from the Malay Peninsula and adjacent islands. The genus is allied both to Sus and Rhinoceros.

2. Palæont.: The genus appears first in the Miocene, and is widely distributed in the Post-Pliocene of North America.

tar (1), tarre, terre, s. [A. S. teoru, teru; cogn. with Dut. teer; Icel. tjara; Dan. tiære; Sw. tjdra; Low Ger. tär; Ger. theer; Ir. tearr.]

1. Chem.: A thick, dark-brown, viscid, oily liquid, produced, together with other products, in the dry distillation of organic bodies and of bituminous minerals. [COAL-TAR.] The chemical constitution of tar is very complicated, but it appears to be a mixture of various substances, acid, alkaline, and neutral. True vegetable tar has always an acid reaction, and is readily miscible with alcohol, glacial acetic acid, ether, chloroform, benzol, &c. It is largely used for coating the planks and cordage of ships, for the preservation of fences, for making pitch, &c.

2. Manuf. & Comm.: Tar from the pine-tree, Pinus sylvestris, is brought from Russia, Norway, Germany, and Sweden. It is superior to that manufactured from other species of pine. In the forests of North Carolina the wood is piled in conical heaps, covered with earth and then fired, the tar being collected at the bottom of the pile. In the inlets of the Gulf of Bothnia a hole is dug in the side of a hill or bank, roots, logs, and billets of the fir are piled into it, the hole is roofed over with turf, and the ligneous matter ignited, and a slow combustion of the mass produced. The tar passes off through a spout on the side of the slope, and is caught in barrels below. In parts of France tar is made in a kiln of brick or stone. [COAL-TAR.]

3. Pharm.: Tar is an external stimulant given in psoriasis, eczema, and other skin diseases. Its vapor inhaled is of use in chronic bronchitis and phthisis.

4. A sailor, a seaman. (In this sense shortened from tarpaulin (q. v.).

"His tars passed their time in rioting among the rabble of Portsmouth."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xiv.

tar-board, s.

Paper: A strong quality of millboard made from junk and old tarred rope.

tar-kiln, s. The name given in North Carolina to the conical piles of wood from which tar is obtained by distillation.

tar-water, s.

*1. A cold infusion of tar, formerly a celebrated remedy for many chronic affections, especially of the lungs. In 1747 it was strongly recommended by the metaphysician Berkeley, Bishop of Cloyne, in his Siris.

"Or haply when their spirits fau'ter, Sprinkling my Lord of Cloyne's tar-water."
Shenstone: Progress of Taste, iv.

2. The ammoniacal water obtained by condensation in the process of gas manufacture.

tar-well, s.

Gas-works: A tank containing water, through which gas is passed to extract the tar.

tar, v. t. [TAR, s.]

1. To smear or cover with tar.

*2. To smear, to cover, to impregnate.

"I have nointed ye, and tarr'd ye with my doctrine,
And yet the murren sticks to ye."

Beaum. & Flét.: Spanish Curate, iii. 2.

¶ (1) Tarred with the same brush: Having the same vices or peculiarities; subject to the same treatment.

(2) To tar and feather a person: To pour heated tar over him, and then cover him with feathers. The practice is very old, and is still occasionally used.

tar (2), s. [TARE.]

tar-fitch, s.

Bot.: Vicia hirsuta.

tar-grass, s.

Bot.: Vicia hirsuta or V. cracca.

ta'-ra (1), s. [Tasmanian or Maori (?).]

Bot.: The tara fern.

tara-fern, s.

Bot.: Pteris esculenta. [PTERIS.]

ta'-ra (2), s. [TARO (1).]

ta-răc-tēs, s. [Gr. taraktēs=a disturber.]

Ichthy.: A genus of Coryphænidæ. Pelagic fishes, allied to Brama (q. v.), from tropical and temperate seas.

ta-ra-guî-ra, s. [Mod. Lat., from native name.]

Zoöl.: A genus of Iguanidæ, from tropical America. Back not crested; scales of back small, of throat granular; tail round, with a slight crest and moderate scales; ear toothed in front.

tār-a-mî-ra, s. [Hind.] See compound. taramira-oil, s. An oil expressed from the seeds of Eruca sativa, cultivated in parts of India. The oil is like colza-oil, except in color. It is used in India for anointing the hair and for food.

ta-răn-dūs, s. [Lat., a word occurring in Pliny: Nat. Hist., viii. 52.]

Zoöl.: A synonym of Rangifer (q. v.).

Tar-ăn-nôn, s. [See def.]

Geog.: A valley and river in North Wales, between Llanidloes and Duras Moroddy.

Tarannon-shale, s.

Geol.: Prof. Ramsay's name for certain beds existing at Tarannon and elsewhere, from South into North Wales. They are 1,000 to 1,500 feet thick in some places, and contain numerous species of Graptolites, corals of the genera Favosites and Cyathophylm, a crinoid (Actinocrinus pulcher), and a brachiopod (Lingula symondsii). Lyell combined them with the Woolhope Limestone and Shale and the Denbighshire grits, placing the whole under the Wenlock Formation (Upper Silurian). Etheridge makes them of Lower Wenlock age. Called by Sedgwick, Rhayader Slates.

Tarannon-slates, s. pl. [TARANNON-SHALE.]

tār-an-tăss, s. [Russ.] A large covered traveling carriage, without springs, but balanced on long poles which serve the purpose, and without seats. Much used in Russia.

ta-răn-těl-la, ta-răn-tělle, s. [Ital.]

Music: A rapid Neapolitan dance in triplets. So called because it was popularly thought to be a remedy against the supposed poisonous bite of the Tarantula spider, which was said to set people dancing. Older specimens of the dance are not in triplets. [TARANTULA.]

ta-răn-tișm, tăr-an-tiș-müş, s. [Fr. tarantisme; Ger. tarantismus, from Italian tarantula (q. v.).]

Mental Path.: An epidemic dancing mania, prevalent in Italy in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, originating in an exaggerated dread of the consequences arising from the bite of the tarantula (q. v.), as a remedy for which the dance of the same name was adopted. This mania was most prevalent in Apulia, but spread over the great part of the peninsula. Tarantism was closely allied to St. Vitus' Dance, and other epidemic nervous disorders of the latter period of the middle ages, but differed from them in its origin, in the wasting away of the sufferers, in their rhythmic movements, their partiality for bright and luminous surfaces, their passion for music, and its employment as a means of cure. According to other authorities, the disease consisted in the sufferer being attacked with extreme somnolency, which could only be overcome by music and dancing. It has long been satisfactorily established that the bite of the tarantula is incapable of producing serious consequences; so that while it is possible that some minor physical symptoms may have resulted from the direct effect of the bite, the mental disturbances and muscular agitations were certainly due to the secondary effects of these physical results upon the imagination.

"Of longer duration than the dancing epidemics of Northern Europe, tarantism was at its height in the seventeenth century, and gradually died out in the eighteenth, leaving only a designation for a lively dance as its harmless legacy."—Quain: Dict. Med., p. 1,588.

ta-răn-tu-lă, s. [Ital. tarantella; O. Ital. tarantola; Fr. tarantule, from Latin Tarentula (now Taranto), a town in the south of Italy, where the animal is found.]

1. Zoöl.: Lycosa tarantula, a large spider, with a body about an inch in length; its bite was formerly supposed to produce tarantism (q. v.), and doubtless, in some cases, produces disagreeable symptoms. It is a native of Italy, but varieties, or closely allied species, are found throughout the south of Europe. The tarantulas of Texas and adjacent countries are large species of Mygale.

*2. The same as TARANTISM (q. v.).

3. A dance; also the music to which it is performed.

tarantula-killer, s.

Entomology: A very large wasp (Pompilus formosus), which captures the Texan tarantula (Mygale hentzii), and places it in its nest as food for its young, after paralyzing it by a sting.

ta-răn-tu-lăt-əd, adj. [TARANTULA.] Bitten by a tarantula; suffering from tarantism.

"Motions unwill'd its pow'r's have shewn, Tarantulated by a tune." Green: The Spleen.

Tarantula.

(One-third natural size.)

tār-a-pa-ca'-ite, subst. [After Tarapaca, Peru, where found; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A mineral described by Raimondi as occurring in minute fragments, mixed with nitratine (q. v.). Color, a brilliant yellow. Composition: Essentially a chromate of potassium; Dana suggests that it needs further examination.

ta-răx'-a-çîn, s. [Lat. taraxac(um); -in.]

Chem.: The bitter principle of dandelion-root, extracted from the milky juice by boiling with water and allowing the concentrated decoction to evaporate. It forms warty crystals of a sharp, bitter taste, soluble in ether, alcohol, and boiling water.

ta-răx'-a-cũm, s. [Gr. taraxis=confusion, from tarassō=to stir up. Named from its alterative effects.]

1. Bot.: Dandelion; a genus of Lactuceæ. Perennial scapigerous milky Composites, with entire or pinnatifid leaves, all radical. Inflorescence a scape, the stalk of which is fistular and leafless; bracts imbricate; receptacle flat, naked, pitted; florets all ligulate, pappus in many series simple, white; fruit compressed, ribbed, muricate above, beaked. Number of species doubtful; perhaps only one, with many varieties. Found in all temperate climates. Taraxacum officinale is the Dandelion; called also Leontodon taraxacum and Taraxacum dens leonis. Sir Joseph Hooker makes these varieties Dens leonis, erythrospermum, lævigatum, and palustre.

2. Pharm.: Decoction, extract, and juice of Taraxicum, i. e., of the Dandelion root, have been given in liver complaint, but are of doubtful efficacy.

ta-răx'-îs, s. [Gr., from tarassō, fut. taraxō=to confound.] A slight inflammation of the eye.

tăr-bôg'-gîn, s. [TOBOGGAN.]

tar-boôsh', tar-bûsch', subst. [Arab.] A red woolen skull-cap, usually ornamented with a blue silk tassel, and worn by Egyptians, Turks, and Arabs; a fez.

"When the demand for the sanguinolent fez or tarbusch may wholly cease."—London Daily Telegraph.

tar'-breëch, s. [Eng. tar (1), s., and breech.] A sailor.

tar-chô-năn-thě-æ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. tarchonanth(us); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -eæ.]

Bot.: A sub-family of Asteroidæ. Leaves alternate; heads of flowers all tubular, the marginal ones smaller and feminine, the central ones fewer, larger, and hermaphrodite or masculine.

tar-chô-năn-thūs, s. [Arab. tarchon=the taragon (q. v.), and Gr. anthos=blossom, flower.]

Bot.: African Fleabane; the typical genus of Tarchonantheæ (q. v.). Cape shrubs, of which two species with purple flowers are cultivated in England.

tar-dă-tion, s. [Lat. tardatus, pa. par. of tardo=to make slow; tardus=slow.] The act of hindering, delaying, or retarding; retardation.

tar-dî-dă-tion, s. [Lat. tardus=slow.] Delay.

"Avoid all snares
Of tardidation in the Lord's affairs."
Herrick: Noble Numbers.

tar-dî-gră-dă, s. pl. [Neut. pl. of Lat. tardigradus=slow-paced; tardus=slow, and gradior=to walk.]

Zoölogy:

¶1. In Illiger's classification, a family of Edentata, containing the Sloths, sometimes classed in one genus, Bradypus, or divided into three genera, Bradypus, Cholepus, and Arctopithecus.

2. Bear-animalcules, Sloth-animalcules; an order of Arachnida, with a single family, Macrobiotidæ (q. v.).

tar'-dî-grăde, a. & s. [TARDIGRADA.]

A. As adjective:

*1. Moving or stepping slowly; slow-paced.

"Fighting their way after them in such tardigrade fashion."—G. Eliot: Romola, ch. xxii.

täre (1), s. [Ety. doubtful; probably from Prov. Eng. tare=brisk, eager. Tare would then signify the quick-growing or destructive plant; A. S. tēran=to tear.]

1. Botany:

(1) Vicia sativa, a vetch, wild in Europe and America, but also largely cultivated as fodder for cattle. It has many trailing or climbing stems, those of the wild being more slender than those of the cultivated plant. Leaves with five or six pairs of leaflets, flowers solitary or twin, legumes one to three inches long, with from four to ten smooth seeds. There are two sub-species, Vicia sativa proper and V. angustifolia.

(2) Lathyrus aphaca. The trailing stems are one to three feet long, and the leaflets on old plants are linear; the peduncles elongate, one flowered; flowers yellow, appearing in June and July.

(3) Ervum, a section or sub-genus of Vicia.

2. Script.: A weed, (Gr. zizanian), resembling wheat, which the botanical tares do not do in the least. Almost certainly Darnel (Lolium temulentum), the "infelix lolium" of Virgil (Geor. i. 154). [DARNEL.]

"And whanne men slepten his enemy came and sewe aboute taris in the myddil of whete and wente away."—Wycliffe: Matthew xiii.

tare-ligne, s. [TARE-VETCH.]

tare-vetch, s.

Bot.: Ervum hirsutum.

täre (2), s. [Fr.=loss, diminution, tare, from Sp. tara=tare, from Arab. tarha, from tarh=throwing, casting, flinging; Port. & Ital. tara.]

Comm.: An allowance or deduction made on the gross weight of goods sold in boxes, barrels, bags, &c., for the weight of the boxes, &c. Tare is said to be real when the true weight of the package is known and allowed for; average, when it is estimated from similar known cases; and customary, when a uniform rate is deducted.

täre, v. t. [TARE (2), s.] To ascertain or mark the amount of tare of.

täre, pret. of v. [TEAR, v.]

Bot.: A sub-order of Marchantiaceæ, having the spore-cases sub-marginal and solitary, and the involucels wanting.

tar-gī-ō-nī-ā, s. [Named after John Anthony Targioni, a Florentine botanist.]

Botany: The typical genus of Targioneæ (q. v.). Frond somewhat fleshy, smooth, deep green, purplish at the edges, forming large patches on moist and exposed banks; capsule solitary, globose, nearly sessile, arising from the end of the midrib of the lower face of the frond. It bursts irregularly at the top, discharging spores and elaters. The species exist chiefly in warm countries.

tar'-gī-ō-nīte, s. [Ety. doubtful.]

Min.: A name given by Bechi in a communication to Dana, but it is printed in his note (American Jour. Science, ser. II., vol. xiv., 1852, p. 60) as Jargonite. Apparently the same as Steinmannite (q. v.).

Tar'-gūm, s. [Chaldee (E. Aramæan) targum, targuma=interpretation, translation; tirgem, targem=to interpret, to translate.]

Jewish Literature: A Chaldee version or paraphrase of the Old Testament, necessitated by the fact that the exiles who returned from Babylon knew that language well, and had partly lost acquaintance with their own. When the Scriptures were read in the synagogues after the return from Babylon, an interpretation or occasional comment was added in Chaldee, then the oral explanations were written, and finally regular Targums arose. There are ten known Targums. The oldest is believed to have been that of Onkelos, which is confined to the Pentateuch. Dr. Samuel Davidson believed that Onkelos was the same as Aquila, that he was a mythic person, and did not write the Targum which bears his name. It was at first a Palestinian production, but was afterward modified by Babylonian Jews. It remained for many years in an unfixed state, but was finally completed by the end of the third century. It was first printed Anglo-Saxon Target.

A. D. 1482, and there were many subsequent editions. The next important Targum was that of Jonathan Ben Uzziel, on Joshua, Judges, Samuel, Kings, and the Prophets. It seems to have arisen in the same way as its predecessor, and to have been completed about the end of the fourth century. A third Targum, called that of the Pseudo-Jonathan, and confined to the Pentateuch, alludes to Khadiyah and Fatima, two of Mohammed's wives, and is not earlier than the middle of the seventh century. A fourth is the Jerusalem one, on the Pentateuch. It is fragmentary, and resembles that of the Pseudo-Jonathan, which it may have preceded by a century. There are less important Targums on the Hagiographa.

"This seed, there spoken of, is Christ, as both the targums expound it."—Milton: Apology for Smectymnuus.

tar'-gūm-ist, s. [Eng. targum; -ist.] The writer of a targum; one versed in the literature and language of the targums.

"Jonathan or Onkelos, the targumists, were of cleaner language."—Milton: Apology for Smectymnuus.

tar'-hood, s. [Eng. tar; -hood.] The state or condition of being a tar; sailors collectively.

"Ridiculed by the whole tarhood."—Walpole: To Mann, ii. 285.

ta'-rī, subst. [Native name.] The sap of Phoenix sylvestris. In India it is used as a beverage, sometimes in its natural condition and sometimes fermented.

tār'-ī-ān, s. [Wel.] An ancient British shield.

tār'-iff, s. [O. Fr. tariffe=arithmetic, casting of accounts (Fr. tarif), from Sp. tarifa=a list of prices, a book of rates, from Arab. ta rif=giving information, from arf=knowing, knowledge.]

1. A list or table of goods with the duties or customs to which they are liable, either on exportation or importation; a list or table of duties or customs to be paid on goods imported or exported, whether such duties are imposed by the government of a country or are agreed upon between the governments of two countries having commerce with each other. The scale of duties depends on the supply and demand of goods, the interests and wants of the community, &c., and is therefore constantly changing.

"However absurd a tariff may be, a smuggler is but too likely to be a knave and a ruffian."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xxi.

¶ The tariff legislation of this country has been constantly fluctuating, and has grown yearly in importance as a question of foreign policy. The most noted tariff bill ever passed by Congress was that taking its name from its proposer, the Hon. William McKinley, of Ohio. This tariff imposed high duties on imports, some specific and others ad valorem. It was repealed in 1894 by the passage of the Wilson bill, which became a law by failure of the President to sign or veto. Upon the tariff question the nation has generally been pretty evenly divided, or with but a slight preponderance in favor of a high protective duty. Of former tariff measures that proposed in 1833 by Henry Clay, of Kentucky, and known as the compromise tariff, occupies the most prominent place in American history. Although Great Britain is now regarded as a free-trade country, yet upon her tariff are listed nineteen articles of import, from which she derives an average of about 20 per cent. of her total revenue. The British tariff is based not upon an ad valorem tax, but depends entirely upon a specific import, in some cases modified by a range of price between the highest and lowest figures, which it sets for an article. Thus for spirits worth a certain amount per gallon, the tax is so much per barrel, while for spirits of the next higher grade (according to price per gallon) a higher duty per barrel is collected.

2. A table or scale of charges generally.

3. A law of Congress fixing the amount of import duties.

tār'-iff, v. t. [TARIFF, s.] To make or draw up a list of duties on, as on imported goods.

tār'-in, s. [Fr.] The skins (q. v.).

tar'-la-tan, s. [Ety. doubtful; cf. Milanese tarlantanna=linsey-woolsey.]

Fabric: A showy, transparent kind of muslin, used for ladies' dresses.

tarn, tarne, terne, s. [Icel. tjörn (genit. tjarnar)=a tarn, a pool; Sw. dial. tjörn, tärn; Norw. tjörn, tjörm.]

1. A small pool or lake on a mountain, especially one which has no visible feeders.

"A lofty precipice in front,
A silent tarn below!"

Wordsworth: Fidelity.

2. A bog, a marsh, a fen.

tar-nā'-tion, s. [See def.] A euphemistic substitute for damnation, used as a mild oath, especially in America. It is also used adjectively and adverbially; as, a tarnation idiot, tarnation strange.

tar'-nīsh, v. t. & i. [Fr. terniss-, stem of ternis-, sant, pr. par. of se ternir=to wax pale, to lose its luster; from M. H. Ger. ternen; O. H. Ger. tarnan, tarnjan=to obscure, to darken; cogn. with A. S. dernan, dyrnan=to hide; O. Sax. derni; O. Fries. dern=hidden, secret.]

A. Transitive:

1. To soil, by an alteration induced by the air, dust, or the like; to diminish or destroy the luster of; to sully.

2. To give, as to gold or silver, a pale or dim cast, without either polishing or burnishing it.

"If a fine object should tarnish by having a great many see it, or the musick should run mostly into one man's ears, these satisfactions would be made inclosure."—Collier: Of Envy.

3. To diminish or destroy the purity or luster of; to cast a stain upon; to sully, to stain.

B. Intrans.: To lose luster, to become dull.

tar'-nīsh, s. [TARNISH, verb.] A stain, a blot, a tarnished state.

tar'-nīsh-ēr, s. [Eng. tarnish; -er.] One who or that which tarnishes.

tar'-nō-vitz-ite, tar'-nō-witz-ite (w as v), s. [After Tarnowitz, Silesia, where found; suffix=ite (Min.); Ger. tarnovicit, tarnovizit.]

Min.: A variety of aragonite (q. v.), containing carbonate of lead.

ta'-rō (1), ta'-ra (2), subst. [Native name.] The tuberous roots of Colocasia esculenta (Caladium esculentum) and Colocasia macrorrhiza. [COLOCASIA.]

ta'-rō (2), subst. [See def.] A Maltese money of account, value about 3½ cents.

tar'-ōc, s. [Etym. doubtful.] A game at cards, played with seventy-eight cards.

tar'-pān, tar'-pa-nŷ, s. [Various Tartar dialects.]

Zoöl.: The wild horse of Tartary. It is mouse-colored, with a stripe along the back, and is supposed to present the nearest approach to the stock from which the domestic horse was derived. The tarpans roam in thousands in the great treeless plains of Tartary, where natives catch them by the lasso.

tar-pāu-līn, tar-pāu-līng, tar-pāw-līng, s. [Eng. tar, and palling=a covering, from pall (Lat. palla).]

1. A cloth of stout canvas, coated with tar or other waterproof compound. Employed on ship-board and ashore for covering hatches, boats, hammocks, &c., and protecting articles generally from the weather. A tarpaulin, or thick unpainted canvas, sometimes called a paulin, forms part of the equipment for each carriage of a field-battery of artillery.

†2. A sailor. (Now usually abbreviated to tar.)

"The Archbishop of Bourdeaux is at present General of the French naval forces, who, though a priest, is yet permitted to turn tarpaulin and soldier."—The Turkish Spy, Letter i.

3. A sailor's hat, covered with painted or tarred cloth; a painted or tarred canvas cover generally.

Tar-pē-i-an rock, s. [See definition.] A rock named from Tarpeia, a vestal virgin, the daughter of Spurius Tarpeius, governor of the citadel on the Capitoline Hill, at Rome. Tarpeia agreed to open the gates to the Sabines if they would give her "what they wore on their arms" (meaning their bracelets.) The Sabines, "keeping their promise to the ear," crushed her to death with their shields, and she was buried in that part of the hill called the Tarpeian rock. Subsequently traitors were cast down this rock and so killed.

tar'-pōn, s. Same as tarpum (q. v.).

tar'-pūm, s. [Native Indian name.] A large American fish of the family Clupeidae. It often grows to more than six feet in length, and has large silvery scales. The scales are used in fancy work, and have become a staple article of trade. Called also tarpon, sabalo, savanilla, silverfish, and jewfish.

"The pin-hooked herring of 'down East' changes to the giant tarpum (Megalops thrissoides), while from the sea comes the huge manatee (sea-cow)."—Field, Dec. 6, 1884.

tar'-quīn-ish, a. [See def.] Like, resembling, or characteristic of Tarquin the Proud, King of Rome; hence, proud, haughty.

tār'-race, tār'-rass, tēr'-rass, trāss, s. [Ger. tarrass, trass; cf. French terrasse=an earthwork; from terre (Lat. terra)=earth.] A volcanic earth used in making cement; also a plaster or cement made in Holland from a soft rock found near Cullen.

tār'-ra-gōn, *tār'-a-gōn, s. [Sp. taragona, taragontia, taragoncia; O. French targon; French estragon; Ital. targone; Low Lat. tragun, tarchon, a corrupt. of draco=a dragon, from Lat. dracunculus=a little dragon; Pers. tarkhun. See def.]

Bot.: Artemisia dracunculus. The stems are two to three feet high, smooth, and bright green. The leaves undivided, narrow, and somewhat succulent. The heads small, round, and smooth, with seven or eight florets. It is a native of Siberia, where the leaves, which emit a stimulating odor, and if chewed produce a pungent moisture in the mouth, are used with many dishes in cookery, and as a flavoring for vinegar.

tarragon-vinegar, s. Vinegar flavored with tarragon.

tarre, v. t. [Low Ger. tarren, targen, tergen; O. Dut. tergen; Dan. tærge; A. S. tergan.] [TARRY.] To stimulate, to urge, to provoke, to incite.

"And, like a dog that is compell'd to fight, Snatch at his master that doth tarre him on."

Shakesp.: King John, iv. 1.

tarred, pa. par. or a. [TAR, v.] tarred-line, s.

Naut.: Cord which has been tarred, in contradistinction to white line.

tarred-links, s. pl. Links or torches used for lighting up forts, trenches, &c. They are made of old rope, well beaten, to soften it, and are covered with a composition of pitch, tar, and mutton-tallow, similar to that used for pitched fascines.

tār'-rī-ānce, *tar-ry-aunce, *tar-ry-ance, *tar-i-ence, s. [Eng. tarry; -ance.] A tarrying; delay.

"My tarriance at Cruck Meole was but of four days."—Southey: Letters, iv. 241.

tār'-rī-ēr (1), *tar-i-er, subst. [Eng. tarry; -er.] One who tarries, delays, or stays.

"And for that cause he is often times called of them Fabius cunctator, that is to say, the tarier or delayer."—Elyot: Governor, bk. i., ch. xxlii.

tār'-rōck, s. [Greenland tatarrok.] The name given in Orkney to the Kittiwake. (See extract.)

"The tarrock (Larus tridactylus, Lin. Syst.), which seems to be our kittiwake, is by far the most common of the kind in this place."—Barry: Orkney, p. 303.

tār'-rōw, v. i. [TARRY.] To delay, to hesitate; to feel reluctance; to murmur at one's allowance. (Scotch.)

"An' I hae seen their coggie fou, That yet hae tarrow't at it."

Burns: A Dream.

tār'-rŷ, *tar-ie, v. i. & t. [A form due to confusion of two Mid. Eng. verbs—(1) tarien=to irritate, (2) targen=to delay. (1) Tarien is from A. S. tergan=to vex; O. Dut. tergen; Dan. targe; German zergen; Scotch targe, tairge. (2) Targen is from O. Fr. targer=to tarry, to delay, from a Low Lat. tardico, from Lat. tardo (Fr. tarder)=to delay, from tardus=slow, tardy (q. v.). The form follows tarien, while the sense goes with targen. (Skeat.)]

A. Intransitive:

1. To stop, to delay; to put off going or coming.

"If that servaunt seye in his herte: my lord tarieth to come, and bigynne to smyte children and handmaydens."—Wycliffe: Luke xii. 45.

2. To stay or remain behind; to wait.

"Tarry ye here for us, until we come again unto you."—Exodus xxiv. 14.

3. To stay, to sojourn, to abide, to lodge.

"Tarry all night and wash your feet."—Genesis xix. 2.

B. Trans.: To wait for; to remain till.

"He that will have a cake out of the wheat, must tarry the grinding."—Shakesp.: Troilus and Cressida, i. 1.

tār'-rŷ, s. [TARRY, v.] Delay, stay, tarriance. "He sayeth his tarry is but short here."—Lodge: Illustr.; Allen to Shrewsbury (an. 1516).

tar'-rŷ, adj. [Eng. tar; -y.] Consisting of or resembling tar; of the nature of tar; smeared with tar; tarred.

tarry-brecks, s. A sailor. (Scotch.)

"Young royal Tarry-Brecks, I learn, Ye've lately come athwart her."

Burns: A Dream.

tarry-fingers, s. pl. Thieving fingers; pilfering fingers. (Scotch.)

tar'-sāl, a. [TARSUS.]

1. Pertaining to the tarsus or instep; as, tarsal bones.

2. Of or pertaining to the tarsi of the eyelids; as, the tarsal cartilages.

ta) sal-bones, s. pl.

Anat.: Seven bones forming the heel, the ankle, and part of the sole of the foot.

tarsal-cartilages, s. pl.

Anat.: Two thin elongated plates, formed of dense connective tissue, placed on each eyelid, and giving it shape and firmness. Called also Tarsi.

tarse, s. [TARSUS.]

tar'-sī, s. pl. [TARSUS.]

tar'-sī-a, tar-sī-a-tū'-ra, s. [Ital.] A species of inlaying in wood, much practiced in Italy during the Middle Ages, especially for wall-paneling. Wood in its natural colors was employed in the earlier specimens, but afterward, when more complicated figures, birds, flowers, &c., were introduced, the various pieces were stained. Shades are produced by immersing the pieces in hot sand; the design is built up on paper, and applied in the manner of veneer.

tar'-sī-ēr, s. [TARSUS.]

tar-sī'-i-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. tarsi(us); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Zoöl.: A family of Lemuroidea (q. v.), with a single genus, Tarsius (q. v.).

tar-sī-pē-dī-næ, subst. pl. [Mod. Lat. tarsipes, genit. tarsiped(is); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -inæ.]

Zoöl.: A sub-family of Phalangistidæ (q. v.), with a single genus, Tarsipes (q. v.). Teeth almost rudimentary and variable in number; tongue long, slender, pointed, and very extensible.

tar-sī-pēs, s. [Mod. Latin tarsi(us), and Latin pes=a foot. Named from a supposed resemblance of its foot to that of Tarsius (q. v.), though it has not the peculiar extension of the calcaneum and scaphoid characteristic of the latter genus.]

Zoöl.: The sole genus of the sub-family Tarsipidæ (q. v.), with a single species, Tarsipes rostratus, the Noolbenger or Tait, from Western Australia. Head with elongated and slender muzzle, mouth-opening small; fore feet with five well-developed toes, hind feet rather long and slender; ears moderate, rounded; tail prehensile, longer than head and body. This little marsupial lives in trees and bushes, and uses its tail in climbing; it feeds on honey, which it procures by inserting its long-tongue into the blossoms of flowers; but one which Mr. Gould kept in confinement ate flies readily.

tar-sī-ūs, subst. [Mod. Latin, from Lat. tarsus (q. v.). Named from the immensely elongated tarsal portion of the foot.]

Zoölogy: The sole genus of the family Tarsiidæ (q. v.), with a single species, Tarsius spectrum, the Tarsier, Malmag, or Specter Tarsier, a very singular little animal, somewhat smaller than an American squirrel, with very large eyes and ears, and a long thin tail, with a tuft at the end; general color fawn-brown, bare parts of a flesh tint, forehead, face, and nose reddish, with a black streak over the eye. It is found in the forests of many of the islands of the Indo-Malayan Archipelago, feeding on insects and lizards. It sleeps during the day, but is very active by night, moving from place to place by jumps, a method of progression for which its curious hind legs, not unlike those of the frog, are well adapted. Its strange appearance causes it to be regarded with superstitious awe by the natives of the East Indian Archipelago. The Tarsier is rare, not more than two being generally found together, and only produces one at a birth.

tar-sō-, pref. [TARSUS.] Of or belonging to the tarsus (q. v.).

tarso-metatarsal, a. & s.

A. As adj.: Belonging to or connected with the tarsus and the metatarsus; as, the tarso-metatarsal ligaments.

B. As substantive:

Compar. Anat.: That part of a bird's leg which is commonly called the tarsus in descriptive ornithology; the bone reaching from the tibia to the toes, which has at its top one of the small tarsal bones confluent with it, so that it consists of part of the tarsus as well as the whole of the metatarsus.

Tarso-metatarsal articulations:

Anat.: The articulations of the four anterior bones of the tarsus: viz., the three cuneiform and the cuboid bones with the metatarsal bones.

tar-sōr'-rha-phŷ, s. [Latin tarsus=a cartilage of the eyelids, and Gr. rhaphe=a seam, a suture; rhapto=to sew.]

Tarsipes Rostratus.

Tarsius Spectrum.

Surg.: An operation for diminishing the size of an opening between the eyelids when it is enlarged by surrounding cicatrices.

tar-söt'-ō-mý, s. [Latin tarsus=a cartilage of the eyelids, and Gr. tomē=a cutting.]

Surg.: The section or removal of the tarsal cartilages.

tar'-sūs (pl. tar'-sī), s. [Gr. tarsos=a stand or frame of wicker-work, a flat basket, the flat of the foot, &c.]

1. Anatomy:

(1) The seven small bones constituting the ankle or instep in man; viz., the calcaneum, the astragalus, the cuboid, the scaphoid, and the three metatarsal bones. They correspond with the carpus or wrist of the anterior limb.

(2) (Pl.): The tarsal cartilages (q. v.).

2. Entom. & Zool. (pl.): (1) The last segments of the legs of insects. (2) The jointed feet of other articulated or annulose animals.

3. Ornith.: The shank of a bird. It may be naked or feathered. In the former case it is protected by scales.

tart, *tarte, a. [A. S. teart=tart, sharp, severe, lit.=tearing, from tær, pa. t. of teran=to tear (q. v.).]

1. Sharp to the taste; acid, acidulated.

"The juice is very tart."—Dampier: Voyages (an. 1686).

2. Sharp, severe, biting, keen.

"The popular harangue, the tart reply,
The logic, and the wisdom, and the wit,
And the loud laugh."—Cowper: Task, iv. 31.

tart, *tarte, subst. [Fr. tarte, tourte, from Lat. torta, fem. sing. of tortus=twisted, pa. par. of torqueo=to twist; Ital. tartera, torta; Sp. torta; Dut. taart; Ger. torte; Dan. tarte.] A kind of small open pie or piece of pastry, consisting of fruit or preserve baked and inclosed in, or surrounded by, paste.

"It grows on a bushy plant, has a bitterish taste, rather insipid; but may be eaten either raw or in tarts, and is used as food by the natives."—Cook: Second Voyage, bk. iv., ch. ii.

tart-rhubarb, subst. Rheum rhabarbaricum and R. hybridum. [RHUBARB.]

tar'-tan (1), s. & a. [Fr. tiretaine = linsey-woolsey, from Sp. tiritaña=a thin woolen cloth, a sort of thin silk, from its flimsiness; tiritar=to shiver, to shake with cold; Port. tiritana.]

A. As substantive:

Fabric: Woolen cloth, cross-barred with stripes of various colors, forming panes, and constituting the peculiar patterns which are said to have formerly distinguished the different Scottish Highland clans, each clan having its own peculiar pattern. North (Record of Dress, Arms, and Sciences of the Highlanders, ii. 16-19) gives a list of the tartans, but other authorities think that the patterns are of comparatively recent invention. The term is also applied to the checkered patterns themselves in which the cloth is woven, and which are frequently printed or painted on various surfaces, as paper, wood, &c.

B. As adj.: Consisting of, made from, or resembling tartan; having the pattern of a tartan.

tar'-tan (2), tar-tane, s. [Fr. tartane; Sp., Port., & Ital. tartana, from Arab. taridah=a kind of vessel specially adapted for transporting horses.]

Naut.: A small vessel with onemast and a bowsprit, the mainsail being spread by a lateen yard. Used in the Mediterranean.

Tar'-tar (1), s. & a. [Better spelled Tatar. The r was inserted in mediæval times to suggest that the Asiatic hordes who occasioned such anxiety to Europe came from hell (Tartarus), and were the locusts of Revelation ix. Pers. Tâtâr=a Tartar or Scythian.]

A. As substantive:

1. A native of Tartary, a name loosely applied to members of various Mongolian races in Asia and Europe.

"Swifter than arrow from the Tartar's bow."
Shakesp.: Midsummer Night's Dream, iii. 2.

2. A courier employed by the Ottoman Porte, and by the European ambassadors in Constantinople.

3. A person of a keen, irritable temper; a vixen, a shrew.

Tartan.

B. As adj.: Pertaining to Tartary or the Tartars.

¶ To catch a Tartar: To be caught in one's own trap; to catch more than was bargained for.

Tartar-bread, s.

Bot.: (1) The great fleshy root of Crambe tartarica. (2) Crambe tartarica. [CRAMBE (1).]

Tar'-tar (2), s. [Lat. Tartarus.] Hell.

"He might return to vasty Tartar back."

Shakesp.: Henry V., ii. 2.

tar'-tar (3), s. [Fr. tartre, from Low Lat. tartarum=the deposit in wine-casks; Sp. & Ital. tartaro.]

Chem.: A generic name for tartaric acid, but applied especially to the acid tartrate of potassium. [ARGOL, CREAM OF TARTAR.]

†¶ (1) Petrified tartar: [TARTARUM.]

(2) Tartar of the Teeth: An earthy substance which is deposited from the saliva on the teeth when proper attention is not paid to them. It consists of salivary mucus, animal matter, and phosphate of lime.

tartar-emetic, s.

Chemistry and Pharmacy: Tartarated antimony. $\text{KO} \cdot \text{SbO}_3 \cdot \text{C}_8\text{H}_4\text{O}_{10} + 2\text{H}_2\text{O}$, or $\text{KSbC}_4\text{H}_4\text{O}_7\text{H}_2\text{O}$. Internally in small doses it is diaphoretic, expectorant, and probably cholagogue; in larger doses it is an emetic or a purgative. When a patient becomes accustomed to it, it is then sedative. Externally it is a powerful irritant, producing pustules like those of small-pox. As an ointment or a hot aqueous solution, it is a powerful counter-irritant.

tar'-tar-ät-éd, adj. [English tartar; -ated.] Having tartaric-acid in its composition.

¶ Tartarated antimony is tartar-emetic (q. v.); tartarated iron is used in pharmacy as a blood restorer; and tartarated soda is Rochelle-salt or Sodio-potassic tartrate (q. v.).

tar-tär'-ë-an, *tar-tär'-ë-ous (1), a. [Lat. Tartareus, from Tartarus=hell.] Pertaining to or characteristic of hell; hellish; infernal.

"At this day,

When a Tartarean darkness overspreads

The groaning nations."

Wordsworth: Excursion, bk. iv.

tar-tär'-ë-ous (2), a. [Eng. tartar (3); -eous.]

1. Ord. Lang.: Consisting of tartar; resembling or partaking of the nature of tartar.

"In fruits, the tartareous parts of the sap are thrown upon the fibers designed for the stone, and the oily upon the seed within it."—Grew: Cosmologia.

2. Bot.: Having a rough crumbling surface, like the thallus of some lichens.

tartareous-moss, s.

Botany & Dyeing: A lichen, Lecanora tartarea. [CUDBEAR.]

Tar-tär'-i-an, Tar-tär'-ic (1), adj. [Eng. Tartary; -ian, -ic.] Of or pertaining to Tartary; Tartar.

Tartarian-bread, s. [TARTAR-BREAD.]

Tartarian-lamb, s.

Bot.: Cibotium barometz. [BAROMETZ.]

tar-tär'-ic (2), adj. [Eng. tartar (3); -ic.] Of, pertaining to, or obtained from tartar.

tartaric-acid, s.

1. Chem.: $\text{C}_4\text{H}_6\text{O}_6 = \text{CHHO}-\text{CO}_2\text{H}$. This formula includes four basic acids distinguished especially by their crystalline forms and action on polarized light. (1) Dextro-tartaric acid; ordinary tartaric acid. Found in grapes, tamarinds, pineapples, and other fruits, and prepared commercially from the argol, or impure potassium tartrate deposited from wine by converting it into a calcium salt, decomposing with dilute sulphuric acid, and allowing the solution to crystallize in a warm place. It forms colorless, monoclinic prisms, which are readily soluble in water and alcohol, has a pure acid taste, and turns the plane of polarization to the right. The acid is largely used by calico-printers. (2) Lævo-tartaric acid (q. v.). (3) Racemic-acid (q. v.), and (4) Meso-tartaric acid. Inactive tartaric acid obtained by the oxidation of sorbin. It has no action on polarized light.

2. Pharmacy: Tartaric-acid diminishes thirst in fevers. It is generally given in the form of cream of tartar or with bicarbonate of soda as an effervescent draught.

tartaric-anhydrides, s. pl.

Chem.: Tartaric acid is capable of forming several anhydrides, three of which are known. (1)

Ditartaric acid= $\text{C}_4\text{H}_6\text{O}_6$ (tartralic acid). Formed by heating tartaric acid for some time at a temperature of 170°. Is very soluble in water and not crystallizable. Its salts are resolved by boiling into ordinary tartrates. (2) Tartretic acid= $\text{C}_4\text{H}_4\text{O}_5$. Soluble tartaric anhydride. Obtained by quickly heating small quantities of tartaric acid until it swells up. It is a yellowish, deliquescent mass, which dissolves in water, forming an acid solution. (3) Insoluble tartaric anhydride. $\text{C}_4\text{H}_4\text{O}_5$. Obtained by heating tartaric acid for some time to 150°, exhausting the product with cold water, and drying it in a vacuum. It is a white powder, insoluble in water, alcohol, and ether, and converted by boiling into tartaric acid.

tar'-tar-in, *tar'-tar-ine, s. [Eng. tartar (3); -in, -ine.] An old name for potash.

tar-tär'-i-üm, s. [TARTARIN.]

tar-tär'-i-zä'-tion, s. [Eng. tartariz(e); -ation.] The act of tartarizing or of forming tartar.

tar'-tar-ize v. t. [English tartar (3); -ize.] To impregnate with tartar; to refine by means of the salt of tartar.

Tar'-tar-ous (1), adj. [Eng. Tartar (1); -ous.] Of, pertaining to, or characteristic of a Tartar; Tartaric, wild, savage.

"All the tartarous moods of common men."

Ben Jonson: Poetaster, v. 1.

tar'-tar-ous (2), a. [Eng. tartar (3); -ous.] Containing or consisting of tartar; resembling tartar.

"The asperity of tartarous salts, and the fiery acrimony of alkaline salts . . . produce nascent passions and anxieties in the soul."—Berkeley: Siris, § 86.

tar'-tar-üm, s. [Latinized form of Eng. tartar (3) (q. v.).] A preparation of tartar. Called also Petrified-tartar.

Tar'-tar-üs, s. [Lat., from Gr. Tartaros.]

Classic Mythol.: A fabled deep and sunless abyss in the lower world, situated, according to Hesiod and Homer, as far below the earth as the earth is below heaven. According to the later poets, Tartarus was the place in which the spirits of the wicked received their due punishment, and sometimes the word is used as synonymous with Hades, or the lower world in general.

Tar'-tar-ÿ, s. [Lat. Tartarus.] Tartarus, hell. (Spenser.)

tar'-tär-ine, s. [See def.]

Fabric: A kind of silk stuff. So called because said to have been obtained from the Tartars.

tart'-ish, adj. [Eng. tart, a.; -ish.] Somewhat tart or acid; rather tart.

tart'-lët, s. [Fr. tartelette, dimin., from O. Fr. tarte=a tart (q. v.).] A little tart.

tart'-lÿ, adv. [Eng. tart, a.; -ly.]

1. In a tart manner; with tartness or acidity of taste.

2. Sharply, severely, bitterly.

"Tartly ridiculing the pretences commonly made for it."—Waterland: Works, viii. 168.

3. With sourness of aspect; sharply.

"How tartly that gentleman looks."—Shakesp.: Much Ado about Nothing, ii.

tart'-nëss, s. [Eng. tart, a.; -ness.]

1. Sharpness to the taste; sourness, acidity.

"The juice had an agreeable tartness, though but little flavor."—Cook: First Voyage, bk. iii., ch. i.

2. Sharpness of language or manner; bitterness, acerbity.

"The tartness of his face sours ripe grapes."—Shakesp.: Coriolanus, v. 4.

tar-tra-, tar-tr-, pref. [TARTRATE, TARTAR (3).] Having tartaric acid in its composition.

tar-tra-më'-thâne, s. [Pref. tartra-, and Eng. methane.] [TARTRAMIC-ETHER.]

tar-träm'-ic, a. [Pref. tartr-, and Eng. amic.] Derived from or containing tartaric acid and ammonia.

tartramic-acid, s.

Chem.: $(\text{CHHO})_2 \begin{matrix} \text{CONH}_2 \\ \text{COOH} \end{matrix}$. Obtained as an ammonium salt by the action of ammonia on tartaric anhydride. The free acid separated from its calcium salt by sulphuric acid is syrupy.

tartramic-ether, s.

Chem.: $(\text{CHHO})_2 \begin{matrix} \text{CO}(\text{NH}_2) \\ \text{CO}(\text{C}_2\text{H}_5)\text{O} \end{matrix}$. Tartramethane. Obtained by the action of alcoholic ammonia on tartaric ether. Ammonia converts it into tartramide.

tar'-tra-mide, s. [Pref. tartr-, and Eng. amide (q. v.).]

Chem.: $\text{C}_2\text{H}_2(\text{OH})_2(\text{CO} \cdot \text{NH}_2)_2$. Obtained by gently heating diethylic tartrate with alcoholic ammonia. It forms rhombic crystals, soluble in water and alcohol.

tar'-tra-nil, s. [Pref. tartr-, and Eng. anil(ine).]

Chem.: $\text{C}_2\text{H}_2\text{O} \begin{matrix} \text{CO}(\text{NH}_2) \\ \text{CO}(\text{C}_6\text{H}_5)\text{O} \end{matrix}$. Phenyltartrimide. Obtained by the dehydration of tartrate of aniline. It may be purified by recrystallization. It is tastefâte, fât, färe, amidst, whât, fâll, father; wê, wêt, hère, camêl, hêr, thêre; pine, pît, sîre, sîr, marine; gô, pôť or, wôre, wôlf, wôrk, whô, sôn; müte, cûb, cûre, unite, cûr, rûle, fûll; trÿ, Sÿrian. æ, œ = ê; ey = â. qu = kw less, forms nacreous laminæ which dissolve in water and alcohol, but sparingly in ether, melt about 200°, and decompose at 230°.

tar'-trate, tar'-tar-ate, s. [Eng. tart(ar)ic]; suff. -ate (Chem.).]

1. Chem.: A salt of tartaric acid.

2. Pharm.: Tartrate of iron and potash=Tartarated Iron (q. v.). Tartrate of potash is given as a diuretic and alterative, or in larger doses as a purgative; and tartrate of soda and potash is Rochelle Salt (q. v.).

tar'-trím-ide, s. [Pref. tartr-, and Eng. imide.]

Chemistry: $C_2H_2O \begin{cases} COH_2N \\ COHO \end{cases}$. A hypothetical substance of which the phenyl compound is known (tartranil).

tar-trón'-ic, a. [Pref. tartr-; Eng. (ket)on(e); ic.] Derived from or containing tartaric acid.

tartronic-acid, s.

Chemistry: $CH(OH)(CO \cdot OH)_2$. Hydroxy-malonic acid. Obtained by evaporating an aqueous solution of dinitro-tartaric acid, or by the action of nascent hydrogen on mesoxalic acid. It crystallizes in large colorless prisms, soluble in water and alcohol, and melts at 180° with evolution of water and carbonic anhydride.

tar'-trō-nŷl, s. [Eng. tartron(ic); -yl.]

Chem.: The acid radical of tartronic acid.

tartronyl-urea, s. [DIALURIC-ACID.]

tar'-trŷl, s. [Eng. tartr(ate); -yl.]

Chem.: $C_4H_2O_2$. The radical of tartaric acid.

tar-trŷl'-ic, a. [Eng. tartryl; -ic.] Contained in or derived from tartryl (q. v.).

tartrylic-acid, s. [TARTARIC-ACID.]

tar-tŭffe, tar-tufe, s. [Fr. tartufe=a hypocrite, from Molière's comedy Tartufe, which is named after the principal character.] A hypocritical pretender; a hypocrite.

tar-tŭff-ish, tar-tŭf-ish, a. [Eng. tartuff(e); -ish.] Hypocritical; rigid or precise in behavior.

"She has some mother-in-law, or tartuffish aunt, or nonsensical old woman, to consult upon the occasion as well as myself."—Sterne.

tar-tŭff-ism, subst. [English tartuff(e); -ism.] Hypocrisy.

tās'-cō, s. [Etym. doubtful.] A sort of clay for making melting-pots.

tās-ē-ōm'-ē-tēr, s. [Greek tasis (genit. taseōs)=a stretching, a straining, and Eng. meter.]

Physics: An instrument, invented by Steiner of Vienna, for measuring the strains to which the different parts of any structure may be submitted. It depends upon the tone given out by a wire or strip when stretched, the variation in length causing a change in the tone.

tā-sim'-ē-tēr, s. [Gr. tasis=stretching, tension, and Eng. meter.]

Physics: An instrument, invented by Edison, for measuring very minute variations of pressure, temperature, moisture, &c. It is founded on the discovery of the inventor that carbon, when pressed in the form of a button, affects the electric currents passing through the same, and offers a resistance which diminishes with the pressure. So sensitive is the carbon that, when this pressure varies to the amount of one-millionth part of an inch, the variation in the electric current passing through it will cause a proportional deflection of the galvanometer needle. The tasimeter is an outgrowth of Edison's experiments with that form of telephone with which he tried to vary the intensity of electric waves by means of the human voice; and its superiority to the thermopile may be thus exemplified: A hot iron placed a few inches from a thermopile will deflect the needle of an ordinary galvanometer about 1°; the human finger, held four inches from a tasimeter, will deflect the needle of a similar galvanometer 6°. The practical uses of the instrument are said to be: (1) Warning vessels of the approach of icebergs, by exposure to the air or to the water cooled by their vicinity; (2) Indicating otherwise inappreciable weights; (3) Recording pressures of air in motion, thus affording a useful addition to the anemometer.

tās-i-mēt'-ric, a. [Eng. tasimeter; -ic.] Pertaining to, or determined by a tasimeter.

task, *taske, s. [O. Fr. tasque, tasche (Fr. tâche), from Low Lat. tasca=a tax, from Lat. taxo=to rate, value, tax (q. v.). Tax and task are thus doublets.]

*1. A tax.

"Granted to the inhabytautes thereof great freedom, and quyt theym of al kyngly taske or tribute."—Fabyan: Chronicle, ch. cc.

2. Business or work imposed by another, generally a definite quantity or amount of work to be done; what duty or necessity imposes; duty or duties collectively.

"This my mean task."—Shakesp.: Tempest, iii. 1.

3. Specifically, a lesson to be learnt; a portion of study imposed by a teacher.

4. Work undertaken; an undertaking.

"Dare to be wise; begin; for, once begun,
Your task is easy; half the work is done."

Francis: Horace; Ep. 1. 2.

5. Burdensome employment; toil, labor.

"All with weary task fordome."

Shakesp.: Midsummer Night's Dream, v. 2.

¶ * (1) At task: To be censured; blamed; taken to task. (Shakesp.)

(2) To take to task: [TAKE, v., ¶ 52.]

task-work, s.

1. Work imposed or performed as a task.

2. Work done by the job, as opposed to day-work or time-work.

task, v. t. [TASK, s.]

1. To impose a task upon; to assign a certain quantity or amount of labor, work, or business to.

"Chains him and tasks him, and exacts his sweat
With stripes." Cowper: Task, ii. 23.

2. To oppress with excessive or severe labor or exertion; to occupy or engage fully, as with a task.

"Some things of weight

That task our thoughts." Shakesp.: Henry V., i. 2.

*3. To charge, to tax with.

*4. To challenge, to summon, to command to do.

"To thy strong bidding,

Task Ariel and all his quality." Shakesp.: Tempest, i. 1.

*5. To impose, to load.

"I dare not task my weakness with any more."

Shakesp.: Othello, ii. 3.

task'-ēr, s. [Eng. task, v.; -er.]

1. One who imposes a task or tasks; a task-master.

"To task the tasker."

Shakesp.: Love's Labor's Lost, ii.

2. One who performs a task or piece of work or labor; in Scotland, often a laborer who receives his wages in kind.

"He is a good daysman, or journeyman, or tasker."—Ward: Sermons, p. 105.

task'-ing, s. [Eng. task; -ing.] Task-work.

"We have done our tasking bravely,
With the thews of Scottish men."

Blackie: Lays of Highlands, p. 103.

task'-mas-tēr, s. [Eng. task, s., and master.] One who imposes a task or tasks; one who assigns tasks to others and superintends their execution.

"Driven to madness by this usage, he killed his task-master."—Taylor: Words and Places (1878), ch. ii.

tās'-lēt, s. [English tasse; dimin. suff. -let.] A piece of armor for the thigh.

"High-pieces of steel, then called taslets."—Scott: Legend of Montrose, p. 16.

Tāš-mā'-nī-an, a. & s. [See def.]

A. As adj.: Of or pertaining to Tasmania or Van Diemen's Land.

B. As subst.: A native or inhabitant of Tasmania.

Tasmanian-devil, s. [NATIVE-DEVIL, URSINE-DASYURE.]

Tasmanian fern-root, s. [TARA.]

Tasmanian sub-region, s.

Ichthy.: A sub-region established by ichthyologists, for the study of the distribution of freshwater fishes. It consists of Tasmania with a portion of Southeastern Australia.

Tasmanian-wolf, s. [THYLACINUS.]

tāš'-man-ite, s. [After Tasmania, where found; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A name given by Church to some small discs, occurring thickly distributed through a laminated shale. Hardness, 2.0; specific gravity, 1.18; luster, resinous; color, reddish-brown. Insoluble in alcohol, ether, benzole, &c. Composition: Carbon, 79.21; hydrogen, 10.23; sulphur, 5.28; oxygen, 5.28=100. The name is more frequently, though erroneously, applied to the shale itself.

tāš-mān'-nī-a, s. [Named after Abel Janssen Tasman, who set sail on his great voyage of discovery on Aug. 14, 1642. It is after him that the island of Tasmania is called.]

Bot.: A genus of Winteræ. Shrubs with simple, evergreen, entire, smooth, leathery, dotted leaves, with inconspicuous flowers, and small indehiscent fruit with shining black seeds. Tasmannia aromatica, a native of Tasmania, is a handsome bush with dull purple branches. Every part is aromatic and pungent to the taste. The fruit is occasionally used as pepper.

täss, *tasse (1), s. [Fr. tasse.] A cup.

"Would you give Rob Campbell a tass of aqua vitæ if he lacked it?"—Scott: Rob Roy, ch. iv.

tässe (2), *tās'-sēt, s. [Fr. tassette; dimin. from tasse=a pouch.]

Old Arm.: Armor for the thighs; one of a pair of appendages to the corselet, consisting of skirts of iron that covered the thighs. They were fastened to the cuirass with hooks.

"Their legs were armed with greaves, and their thighs with tasses."—North: Plutarch, p. 273.

tās'-sēl (1), *tās'-tle (tle as ēl), s. [O. Fr. tassel=a fastening, a clasp (Fr. tasseau=a bracket); Low Lat. tassellus=a tassel, from Latin taxillum, accus. of taxillus=a small die, dimin. of talus=a knuckle bone, a die; Italian tassello=a collar of a cloak, a square. A tassel was probably originally a sort of button made of a piece of squared bone, and afterward of other materials. (Skeat.)]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. A sort of pendent ornament, consisting generally of a roundish mold covered with twisted threads of silk, wool, or the like, which hang down in a thick fringe. They are attached to the corners of cushions, curtains, walking-sticks, sword-hilts, &c.

"Robes of fur and belts of wampum, . . .

Beautiful with beads and tassels."

Longfellow: Hiawatha, xi.

2. Anything resembling a tassel, as the pendent head or flower of some plants.

"From the tassels of the birch-tree."

Longfellow: Hiawatha, xviii.

3. A small ribbon of silk sewed to a book, to be placed between the leaves.

II. Arch.: A board beneath the mantel-piece.

tassel-grass, s.

Bot.: Ruppia maritima.

tās'-sēl (2), s. [TIERCEL.]

tassel-gent, *tassel-gentle, s. A trained male goshawk or tiercel; a tiercel-gentle.

"Hist, Romeo, hist!—O, for a falconer's voice

To lure this tassel-gentle back again!"

Shakesp.: Romeo and Juliet, ii. 2.

tās'-sēl (3), s. [TORSEL.]

tās'-sēl (4), s. [TEASEL.]

tās'-sēl (5), s. [TUSSLE.] (Scotch.)

tās'-sēl, v. t. [TASSEL (1), s.] To adorn with tassels.

tās'-sēlled, *tās'-seled, *tas-siled, a. [English tassel (1), s.; -ed.] Adorned with tassels.

"Ere . . . tassell'd horn Shakes the high thicket."—Milton: Arcades.

tās'-sīe, s. [A dimin. from tass (q. v.).] A cup, a small vessel. (Scotch.)

tāst'-a-ble, a. [Eng. tast(e); -able.] Capable of being tasted; savory, relishing.

"Their distilled oils are fluid, volatile, and tastable."—Boyle.

tāste, *taaste, *tast, v. t. & i. [O. Fr. taster=to taste or assay, to handle, to feel, to touch; French tâter; Ital. tastare=to taste, to feel, to grope, to try, to probe. From a hypothetical Low Latin taxito, a frequent. from Latin taxo=to feel, to handle, from tactus, pa. par. of tango=to touch; Dut. & Ger. tasten=to touch, feel.]

A. Transitive:

*1. To try by the touch; to handle, to feel; to try or prove by touching or feeling.

"I rede thee let thin hond upon it falle

And tast it wel, and ston thou shalt it find Sin that thou seest not with thin eyen blind."

Chaucer: C. T., 15th 700.

*2. To try, to test.

"And he now began

To taste the bow, the sharp shaft took, tugged hard."

Chapman: Homer's Odyssey, xxi.

*3. To become acquainted with by actual trial or experience; to experience, to undergo.

"Ther ben summe of hem that stonden heere, whiche schulen not taste deeth, till thei se mannes sone comynge in his kyngdom."—Wycliffe: Matt, xvi.

*4. To understand; to become acquainted with.

"Acquaint thyself with God, if thou wouldst taste

His works." Cowper: Task, v. 779.

5. To participate in; to partake of. (Usually with an implied sense of pleasure or enjoyment.)

"Sweets tasted here, and left as soon as known."

Cowper: Task, i. 653.

6. To try by the touch of the tongue; to perceive the relish or flavor of by taking a small quantity into the mouth.

"They . . . put the glass to their lips, but having tasted the liquor, they returned it, with strong expressions of disgust."—Cook: First Voyage, bk. i., ch. iii.

7. To try by eating; to eat.

"I tasted a little of this eaty."—1 Samuel xiv. 29.

hōll, bōy; pōut, jōwł; cat, qell, chorus, qhin, bench; go, gem; thin, t̃his; sin, aš; expect, Xenophon, ex̃ist. ph = f. -cian, -tian = shan. -tion, -sion = shūn; -t̃ion, -s̃ion = zhūn. -tious, -cious, -sious = shūs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bēl, dēl

B. Intransitive:

1. To try food or drink by the mouth; to eat or drink a little by way of trial, so as to perceive the flavor; to try or test the flavor of food or drink.

2. To eat.

"Of this tree we may not taste or touch,"

Milton: P. L., ix. 651.

*3. To have experience, perception, or enjoyment; to partake.

"Bound in thine adamant chain,

The proud are taught to taste of pain."

Gray: Hymn to Adversity.

*4. To enjoy sparingly. (Followed by of.)

5. To have a smack or flavor; to have a particular quality, flavor, relish, or savor when applied to the tongue, palate, or other organ of taste; to smack. (Used absolutely before an adjective; as, It tastes bitter, sweet, &c.; followed by of before an object.)

"If your butter tastes of brass, it is your master's fault, who will not allow a silver saucepan."—Swift: Instruct. to Servants.

tāste, *tast, s. [TASTE, v.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The act of tasting; gustation.

"The fruit

Brought death into the world and all our woe,"

Milton: P. L., i. 2.

2. That sense by which we perceive the characteristic or distinctive relish or savor of anything when brought into contact with special organs situated in the mouth. [II.]

"The organ of taste is the tongue and palate."—Locke: Nat. Philos., ch. xi.

3. A particular nervous sensation excited by certain bodies, which are called sapid, when brought into contact with the tongue, palate, &c., and moistened with saliva; flavor, savor.

"It begins to boile like newe wine, & to be sower and sharp of taste."—Hackluyt: Voyages, i. 97.

4. Power of appreciating or distinguishing between the flavor of different substances.

"For thou of love hast lost thy taste I gesse,
As sicke man hath of sweet and bitterness."

Chaucer: Assemble of Fowles.

5. Intellectual relish or discernment; appreciation, liking and inclination. (Formerly followed by of, now by for; as, a taste for music, a taste for chemistry, &c.)

6. Nice perception, or the power of perceiving and relishing excellence in human performances; the power of appreciating the finer qualities of art, as exhibited by the practical artist, or felt by the amateur or connoisseur; the faculty of discerning beauty, order, congruity, proportion, symmetry, or whatever constitutes excellence, particularly in the fine arts or literature; that faculty of the mind by which we both perceive and enjoy whatever is beautiful or sublime in the works of nature and art. The possession of taste insures grace and beauty in the works of an artist, and the avoidance of all that is low or mean. It is as often the result of an innate sense of beauty or propriety as of art-education, and no genius can compensate for the want of it.

7. Manner with respect to what is pleasing; the pervading air, choice of circumstances, or general arrangement in any work of art, by which taste on the part of the artist or author is evinced; style.

"Taste is, perhaps, his only director. Taste in writing is the exhibition of the greatest quantity of beauty and of use that may be admitted into any description without counteracting each other."—Goldsmith: Polite Learning, ch. vii.

8. Manner with respect to what is becoming, proper, refined, or in accordance with the laws of politeness and good society; as, That remark is not in good taste.

*9. The act of feeling or experiencing.

"I have almost forgot the taste of fears."

Shakesp.: Macbeth, v. 5.

10. Trial, experiment, essay, proof, specimen.

"Have we not had a taste of his obedience?"

Shakesp.: Coriolanus, iii. 1.

11. A small portion given as a specimen or sample; a little piece or bit tasted, eaten, or drunk.

II. Technically:

1. Physiol.: The specific organs producing the sense of taste are the endings of the glosso-pharyngeal and lingual nerves in the mucous membrane of the tongue and palate, the tongue and lips acting as subsidiary organs by bringing the sapid substances into contact with the mucous membrane of the mouth. It is not yet decided whether the taste-buds (q. v.) are special organs of taste. The tastes thus cognizable are broadly classified into acid, saline, bitter, and sweet. It is essential to the development of taste that the substance brought in contact with the tongue be dissolved, and the effect is greatest when its temperature is about 40°. The relative position of the nostrils and the mouth insures that nothing can enter the latter without sending into the former some of the odoriferous particles which may exist in the substance swallowed, and the impressions received through the organs of taste and smell are so blended together as to become one. No special organ of taste has been discovered in invertebrate animals; and it seems probable that among the vertebrates it rises with the advance of organization, reaching its full development in man.

2. Psychol.: Tastes differ so much among individuals, nations, or in different ages and conditions of civilization, that it is utterly impossible to set up a standard of taste applicable to all men and to all stages in the evolution of society.

¶ (1) Taste, in a material sense, is applicable to every object that can be applied to the organ of taste, and to every degree and manner in which the organ can be affected; some things are tasteless, other things have a strong taste, and others a mixed taste. The flavor is the predominating taste, and consequently is applied to such objects as may have a different kind or degree of taste; an apple may not only have the general taste of apple, but also a flavor peculiar to itself; the flavor is commonly said of that which is good, as a fine flavor, a delicious flavor; but it may designate that which is not always agreeable, as the flavor of fish, which is unpleasant in things that do not admit of such a taste.

(2) He who derives particular pleasure from any art may be said to have a taste for it; he who makes very great proficiency in the theory and practice of any art may be said to have a genius for it. One may have a taste without having genius, but it would not be possible to have genius for a thing without having a taste for it.

taste-bud, s.

Anat. (pl.): Ovoidal or flask-shaped bodies discovered by Loven and Schwalbe on the surface of the tongue. They are believed to be special organs of taste. Their lower parts are in contact with the corium, the upper ones appear as pores.

tāst'-'ēd, a. [Eng. tast(e); -ed.] Having a particular taste or relish.

"Coleworts are reported . . . to be better tasted, if they be sometimes watred with salt-water."—Bacon: Nat. Hist., § 460.

tāste'-fūl, a. [Eng. taste; -ful(l).]

1. Having a high or strong taste or relish; savory.

"A kid's well-fatted entrails, tasteful food."

Pope: Homer's Odyssey, xviii. 51.

2. Endowed with taste; capable of discerning and appreciating what is beautiful, sublime, noble, or the like; possessing good taste.

"His tasteful mind enjoys Alike the complicated charms, which glow
Thro' the wide landscape."

Cooper: Power of Harmony, ii.

3. Characterized by or exhibiting good taste; produced, arranged, constructed, or regulated by or in accordance with good taste; as, a tasteful pattern.

tāste'-fūl-lŷ, adv. [Eng. tasteful; -ly.] In a tasteful manner; in or with good taste; as, a garden tastefully laid out.

tāste'-fūl-nēss, s. [Eng. tasteful; -ness.] The quality or state of being tasteful.

tāste'-lēss, a. [Eng. taste; -less.]

1. Having no taste; exciting no sensation in the organs of taste.

2. Incapable of experiencing the sense of taste; destitute or deprived of the sense of taste.

3. Having no power of giving pleasure; stale, flat, insipid.

"A while on trivial things we held discourse,
To me soon tasteless."

Wordsworth: Excursion, bk. i.

*4. Not possessing taste, or the appreciation and enjoyment of what is good, beautiful, excellent, noble, or the like; destitute of taste; having bad taste.

5. Not originating from or in accordance with good taste; in bad taste; characterized by bad taste.

tāste'-lēss-lŷ, adv. [Eng. tasteless; -ly.] In a tasteless manner; without taste.

tāste'-lēss-nēss, s. [Eng. tasteless; -ness.]

1. The quality or state of being tasteless, or without flavor; insipidity.

2. Want of taste, or the appreciation of what is good, beautiful, excellent, noble, or the like.

"Venting my vexations in censures of the forwardness and indiscretion of girls, or the inconstancy, tastelessness, and perfidy of men."—Rambler, No. 119.

3. Absence of good taste.

tāst'-'ēr, s. Eng. tast(e), v.; -er.]

1. One who tastes.

2. Specif., one whose duty it is to ascertain the quality, &c., of food or drink by tasting it before submitting it to his master. Tasters were important officials in the courts of mediæval princes, their duty being to take care that no poison or other injurious matter was introduced into their lord's food, for which purpose they tasted all the food or drink themselves before giving it to him.

"The lights are disposed in order about the cups; the cup-bearers, skinkers, and tasters, are changed."—P. Holland: Plutarch, p. 177.

3. One employed to taste the quality of provisions, &c., by tasting samples submitted to him by the vendors; as, a tea-taster.

See def.] A screen made of split bamboo placed vertically in doors and windows in India (the window frames being temporarily taken out) while the dry hot wind is blowing during April, May, and June. A native with a pail of water stands outside drenching the mat, so that every interstice has a drop of water. As the dry wind blows into the house through these drops, evaporation takes place with such speed as to cool the wind, which enters the house at a temperature quite refreshing. A single pane of glass is sometimes placed in the window tattie to afford the inmates of the room a small amount of light. When the hot season is succeeded by the rainy season, the tatties are removed, as the wind is already saturated with moisture, and the temperature does not require to be artificially reduced. (Anglo-Indian.)

"Inquire at London, 'mong the taverns there: For there they say he daily doth frequent."—Shakesp.: Richard II., iii. 5.

¶ Taverns existed in England at least as early as the thirteenth century. By 13 Edward I., c. 5, passed in 1284, they were ordered to be shut at curfew. In the reign of Edward III. (1326-1377), only three were allowed in London; one in "Chepe," one in "Walbrook," and one in Lombard Street. By 7 Edward VI. (1552-3), forty were allowed in London, eight in York, six in Bristol, four each in Norwich, Hull, Exeter, Gloucester, Chester, Canterbury, Cambridge, and Newcastle upon Tyne, and three each in Westminster, Lincoln, Shrewsbury, Salisbury, Hereford, Worcester, Southampton, Ipswich, Winchester, Oxford, and Colchester. Taverns were first licensed in 1752. In the early days of this country roadside taverns were frequent, but since the development of railroads they have given place to the hotel.

tavern-bush, s. The bush formerly hung out as a sign for inns. (Longfellow: Catawba Wine.)

tavern-haunter, s. One who frequents taverns.

1. The keeper of a tavern; an innkeeper.
2. A tippler.

tavern-token, s. A token issued of old by a tavern-keeper, and current only at his house. Gifford, however, suggests (Ben Jonson: Every Man in his Humor, i. 3. Note.) that a tavern-token was simply an ordinary token, so called because "most of them would travel to the tavern." The first illustration represents a copper token of the Ship tavern at Greenwich, England; the second is a brass token of the old Cock (now demolished) in Fleet Street, London. Both were of the value of one farthing.

¶ 1. To swallow a tavern-token: A euphemism=To be drunk. (Used only in the past tenses.)

"Drunk, sir! you hear not me say so; perhaps he swallowed a tavern-token or some such device."—Ben Jonson: Every Man in his Humor, i. 3.

*2. To hunt a tavern fox: To be drunk. [FOXED, 1.]

"Nor did he ever hunt a tavern fox."—J. Taylor: Life of Old Parr. (1635.)

tâw'-dri-nëss, s. [Eng. tawdry; -ness.] The quality or state of being tawdry.

"There was a kind of tawdriness in their habits."—Moral State of England (1670), p. 161.

tâw'-drý, *tâw'-drîe, a. & s. [A corrupt. of St. Audry, that is, St. Etheldrida (A. S. Ætheldrydh), and originally applied to a rustic necklace bought at St. Audry's Fair, held in the Isle of Ely and elsewhere on St. Audry's Day, Oct. 17. Another account is that St. Audry died of a swelling in the throat, which she considered as a particular judgment for having been in her youth much addicted to wearing this necklace. It did not at first imply mean or shabby splendor.]

A. As adjective:

*1. Fine, showy, elegant.

2. Showy without taste or elegance; having an excess of showy ornaments without grace; gaudy.

"All that artificial tawdry glare, Which Virtue scorns, and none but strumpets wear."
Churchill: Prophecy of Famine.

Entomol.: A European night-moth, Xylina semi-brunnea.

tawny-sheers, s.

Entomol.: A European night-moth, Dianthæcia carpophaga. The larva feeds on the bladder campion (Silene inflata).

tawny-wave, s.

Entomol.: A European geometer moth, Acidalia rubricata.

tâw'-ný, v. t. [TAWNY, a.] To tan.

"The sunne so soone the painted face will tawny."
Breton: Mother's Blessing, p. 9.

tâw'-pie, s. [TAUPIE.]

tâwş, tâwşë, subst. [A. S. tawian=to beat, to scourge.] A leather strap, usually with a slit or fringe-like end, used as an instrument of punishment by schoolmasters and others. (Scotch.)

tăx, taxe, s. [Fr. taxe=a taxation, from taxer=to tax, to rate, to assess, from Lat. taxo=to handle, . . . to rate, to value; Low Lat. taxa=a rating, a taxation. Taxo is for tacto, from tactus, pa. par. of tango=to touch. Tax and task are doublets; Sp. tasa; Port. taxa; Ital. tassa.]

1. A contribution imposed by authority upon people to meet the expenses of government or other public services.

(1) A government imposition, or charge made by the state on the income or property of individuals, or on products consumed by them. A tax is said to be direct when it is demanded from the very persons who it is intended or desired should pay it, as a poll-tax, income-tax, property-tax, taxes for keeping dogs, &c. An indirect tax is one demanded from one person, who is expected and intended to recoup or indemnify himself at the expense of another, as customs and excise duties.

"Poets, of all men, ever least regret Increasing taxes and the nation's debt."

Cowper: Table Talk, 177.

(2) Any rate or sum imposed upon individuals for municipal, county, or other local purposes, as police taxes, taxes for the repairs of roads, bridges, &c., poor-tax, drainage-tax, &c.

2. A disagreeable or burdensome duty or charge; an oppressive demand or exaction; a requisition; as, This is a heavy tax on his time and strength.

*3. A task; a lesson to be learned.

*4. Charge, censure.

"He could not without grief of heart, and without some tax upon himself and his ministers for the not executing the laws, look upon the bold license of some pamphlets."—Clarendon.

¶ Tax applies to or implies whatever is paid by the people to the Government, according to a certain estimate: the customs are a species of tax which are less specific than other taxes, being regulated by custom rather than any definite law; the customs apply particularly to what was customarily given by merchants for the goods which they imported from abroad. The predominant idea in contribution is that of common consent; it supposes a degree of freedom in the agent which is incompatible with the exercise of authority expressed by the other terms, hence the term is with more propriety applied to those cases in which men voluntarily unite in giving toward any particular object; as charitable contributions, or contributions in support of a war; but it may be taken in the general sense of a forced payment, as in speaking of military contribution.

tax-cart, taxed-cart, s. A light English spring-cart on which only a low rate of tax is charged.

tax-free, a. Exempt or free from taxation.

tax-gatherer, s. A collector of taxes.

"The Protestant ministers were harassed by the tax-gatherers."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. vi.

2. To assess to a tax; to levy a tax on.

"The arable lands which are given in lease to farmers are taxed at a tenth of the rent."—Smith: Wealth of Nations, bk. v., ch. ii.

3. To load with a burden or burdens; to make demands on; to put to a certain strain.

"Taxing her mind to aid her eyes."

Scott: Bridal of Triermain, ii. 4.

4. To charge, to censure, to accuse. (Followed by for or with (more generally the latter) before an indirect object, and formerly also by of; as, to tax a man with falsehood.)

"She confesses the truth of her husband's accusation; but she taxes the serpent as her seducer."—Bp. Horsley: Sermons, vol. ii., ser. 16.

II. Law: To go through and allow or disallow the items of charge in.

"A returning officer, whose bill of costs has been taxed on the application of the candidates."—London Daily Telegraph.

tăx-a-bîl'-î-tý, subst. [Eng. taxable; -ity.] The quality or state of being taxable.

tăx-a-ble, a. [Eng. tax; -able.] Liable to be taxed; capable of being taxed; subject to taxation.

"Leave America, if she has taxable matter in her, to tax herself."—Burke: American Taxation.

tăx-a-ble-nëss, s. [Eng. taxable; -ness.] The quality or state of being taxable; taxability.

tăx-a-blý, adverb. [Eng. taxab(le); -ly.] In a taxable manner.

tăx-ă-çë-æ, s. [Lat. tax(us); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -aceæ.]

Bot.: Taxads; an order of Gymnogens. Trees or shrubs with continuous inarticulated branches, the wood with circular disks. Leaves evergreen, generally narrow, rigid, entire, veinless, alternate or distichous, sometimes dilated and lobed, in which case the veins are forked and of equal thickness. Flowers dioecious, naked, surrounded by imbricated bracts. Males having several stamens; filaments usually monadelphous. Female solitary, ovules naked, the foramen at the apex, the outer skin finally becoming hard. Pericarp imperfect, usually cup-shaped, succulent; embryo, dicotyledonous. Known genera nine, species fifty. (Lindley.)

tăx'-ăd, s. [Lat. tax(us); Eng. suff. -ad.]

Bot. (pl.): Lindley's name for Taxaceæ (q. v.).

tăx-ă-tion, subst. [Fr., from Lat. taxationem, accus. of taxatio, from taxatus, pa. par. of taxo=to handle . . . to tax (q. v.); Ital. tassazione.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The act of imposing a tax or taxes on the subjects of a state or government, or on the members of a corporation or company by the proper authority, for the raising of revenue to meet the expenses of public services; the raising of revenue by means of taxes; the system by which such revenue is raised.

"There are two different circumstances, which render the interest of money a much less proper subject of direct taxation than the rent of land."—Smith: Wealth of Nations, bk. v., ch. ii.

2. A tax or assessment imposed; the aggregate of particular taxes.

"The taxation by that way of assessment seemed greater then in old time."—Camden: Hist. Elizabeth (an. 1590).

*3. Demand, claim.

"I bring no overture of war, no taxation of homage."—Shakesp.: Twelfth Night, i. 5.

*4. Charge, censure, accusation, scandal.

"My father's love is enough to honor; speak no more of him, you'll be whipt for taxation one of these days."—Shakesp.: As You Like It, i. 2.

II. Law: The act of taxing or examining a bill of costs in law.

tăx'-a-tive-lý, adv. [TAX.] As a tax.

"If these ornaments or furniture had been put taxatively, and by way of limitation, such a thing bequeathed as a legacy shall not be paid, if it wants ornaments or furniture."—Ayliffe: Parergon.

tăxed, pa. par. or a. [TAX, v.]

taxed-cart, s. A tax-cart (q. v.).

tăx'-el, s. [Late Lat. taxus=a badger.]

Zoöl.: Taxidea americana, the American badger. The snout is shorter and more hairy than that of the European badger; the body of a whitish color, sometimes shaded with gray or tawny. Length, excluding the tail, about twenty-four inches, tail six inches. It abounds on the plains watered by the Missouri, but its southern range is not exactly defined. It appears to be more carnivorous than the European species.

tăx'-ër, s. [Eng. tax, v.; -er.]

1. One who taxes.

"For the first of these I am a little to alter their name; for instead of takers, they become taxers; instead of taking provision for your majesty's service, they tax your people ad redimendam vexationem."—Bacon: Speech Touching Purveyors.

2. In Cambridge University, one of the officers chosen yearly to regulate the assize of bread, and see the true gauge of weights and measures observed; a taxor.

Greek Antiq.: An Athenian military officer commanding a taxis or battalion.

tăx'-î-corn, s. [TAXICORNES.] A beetle belonging to the order Taxicornes (q. v.).

tăx-i-cor'-nëş, s. pl. [Gr. taxis=arranging, and Lat. cornu=a horn.]

Entom.: The second family of Latreille's Heteromera. They are all winged; the body is for the most part square, with the thorax concealing or perfoliate the head; antennæ short, more or less perfoliate or grained; the legs adapted for walking. They live in fungi, beneath the bark of trees, or on the ground under stones. Tribes, Diaperales and Cossyphense.

tăx-id'-ě-a, s. [Late Lat. tax(us)=a badger, and Gr. eidōs=form; cf. Lat. taxoninus=pertaining to a badger (according to Smith, probably from the Celtic name of the badger; Ger. dachs=a badger.)

Zoöl.: A genus of Melineæ, with one, or perhaps two species. Taxidea americana (flabradorica) is the Common American Badger of the United States. T. berlandieri, the Mexican Badger, is possibly only a local variety. [TAXEL.]

tăx-i-dër'-mîc, a. [Eng. taxiderm(y); -ic.] Of or pertaining to taxidermy.

bôil, bôý; pôut, jôwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, çhis; sin, aş; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f.
-cian, -tian = şan. -tion, -sion = şün; çion, -şion = zhün. -tious, -cious, -sious = şüş. -ble, -dle, &c. = bel, del.

tăx'-l-dēr-mĭst, subst. [Eng. taxiderm(y); -ist.] One who is skilled in taxidermy; one who prepares, preserves, and stuffs the skins of animals.

"A seven-pounder, which at the present moment is being set up by a Reading taxidermist."—Field, June 4, 1887.

tăx'-l-dēr-mŷ, subst. [Gr. taxis=order, arrangement, and derma=skin.] The art of preparing and preserving the skins of animals, and also of stuffing and mounting them, so as to cause them to resemble the living forms as nearly as possible.

tăx'-in, s. [Lat. tax(us)=a yew-tree; -in.]

Chem.: A resinous substance extracted from the leaves of the yew-tree by treatment with alcohol containing tartaric acid. It is slightly soluble in water, soluble in alcohol, ether, and dilute acids, and precipitated from acid solutions by alkalies in white bulky flocks.

tăx'-in'-ē-æ, s. pl. [Latin tax(us); fem. pl. adj. suff. -ineæ.]

Botany: A tribe of Coniferæ, founded by Richard. Flowers dioecious; cones much reduced; scales small, thin, or coriaceous, the upper with one ovule. Seed hard, with a fleshy coat, or seated in a fleshy cup. Pollen globose. (Sir J. Hooker.)

tăx'-lĭng, pr. par. or a. [TAX, v.] taxing-master, s.

Eng. Law: An officer of a court of law, who examines bills of costs, and allows or disallows charges.

tăx'-is, s. [Gr.=order, arrangement; tassō, fut. taxō=to set in order.]

1. Ancient Arch.: That disposition which assigns to every part of a building its just dimensions. It is synonymous with Ordonnance in modern architecture.

2. Greek Antiq.: A division of troops corresponding in some respects to the modern battalion.

3. Surg.: An operation by which those parts which have quitted their natural situation are replaced by the hand without the assistance of instruments, as in reducing hernia, &c.

tăx'-l'-tēs, s. [Gr. taxos=a yew tree; suff. -ites.]

Palæobot.: A genus of plants akin to Taxus (q. v.). Two species from the Lower Jurassic, two from the Eocene, and one or more from the Oligocene.

tăx'-lēss, a. [Eng. tax; -less.] Free or exempt from taxes or taxation.

"More recently, when a docked-tail colley was taxless."—Field, Feb. 27, 1886.

tăx'-ō-crī-nī-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. taxocrin(us); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Palæont.: A family of Crinoidea. Basals three, very small; five subradial or parabal pieces supporting three to seven circles of radials; Silurian to the Carboniferous.

tăx'-ō-crī-nūs, s. [Gr. taxos=a yew, and krinon=a lily.]

Palæont.: The typical genus of Taxocrinidæ. Upper Silurian and Carboniferous.

tăx'-ō-dī-tēs, s. [Mod. Lat. taxod(ium); suff. -ites.]

Palæobot.: A genus of Cupressæ, akin to Taxodium.

tăx'-ō-dī-ŭm, s. [Lat. taxus=a yew, and Gr. eidōs=form.]

1. Bot.: A genus of Cupressæ. Taxodium distichum, the Deciduous Cypress, is stimulating and diuretic.

2. Palæobot.: From the Cretaceous and Great Lignite of North America onward.

tăx'-ō-dōn, s. [Late Latin tax(us)=a badger; suff. -odon.] [TAXIDEA.]

Palæont.: A genus of Mustelidæ, with affinities to the Badgers and the Otters, from the Miocene of Western Europe.

tăx'-ōl'-ō-gŷ, subst. [Gr. taxis=order, arrangement, and logos=a word, a discourse.] The same as TAXONOMY (q. v.).

tăx'-ō-nōm'-ic, a. [Eng. taxonom(y); -ic.] Pertaining to or involving taxonomy or systematic classification.

tăx'-ōn'-ō-mŷ, s. [Greek taxis=order, arrangement, and nomos=law.]

1. That department of natural history which treats of the laws and principles of classification.

2. The laws and principles which govern classification.

"We must learn something of the arrangement and classification of living beings—i. e., of the science of taxonomy."—St. George Mivart: The Cat, ch. i., § 11.

tăx'-or, subst. [Eng. tax, v.; -or.] The same as TAXER, s. (q. v.).

tăx'-ōx'-ŷl'-ōn, s. [Gr. taxos=the yew tree, and xylon=wood.]

Palæobot.: A genus of Coniferæ with wood like that of the Taxus (q. v.). Found with Taxites in the Lower Oligocene.

tăx'-ūs, s. [Lat., from Gr. taxos=a yew tree.]

Botany: Yew; the typical genus of Taxaceæ or Taxineæ. Fruit drupaceous, composed of a cup-shaped, fleshy receptacle, with dry empty scales at its base, surrounding a naked bony seed. Only known species Taxus baccata, the Common Yew. [Yew.] Taxus fastigiata, the Irish or Florence Court Yew, is a variety of this species.

Tă-ŷg'-ē-tē, s. [Lat.=daughter of Atlas and Pleione, changed by Diana into a stag.]

Astron.: One of the Pleiades.

Tăy'-lōr, s. [See def. of compound.]

Taylor's theorem, s.

Math.: A theorem discovered by Dr. Brook Taylor, and published by him in 1715. Its object is to show how to develop a function of the algebraic sum of two variables into a series arranged according to the ascending powers of one of the variables, with coefficients which are functions of the other. Taylor's formula is as follows:

$$f(x+y)=u+\frac{du}{dx}y+\frac{d^2u}{dx^2}\frac{y^2}{1.2}+\frac{d^3u}{dx^3}\frac{y^3}{1.2.3}+\frac{d^nu}{dx^n}\frac{y^n}{1.2..n}$$

In which the first member is any function of the sum of two variables, and u is what that function becomes when the leading variable y is made equal to 0. It fails to develop a function in the particular case in which u, or any of its successive differential coefficients, becomes infinite for any particular value of the variable which enters them. It only fails for the particular value, holding good for all other values.

tăy'-lōr-ite, s. [After J. W. Taylor, who analyzed it; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A mineral found in small concretions having crystalline structure, in the guano-beds of the Chincha Islands. Hardness, 2.0; color, yellowish-white; taste, pungent and bitter. Composition: Sulphuric acid, 47.8; potash, 47.0; ammonia, 5.2=100, which is equivalent to the formula $(\frac{1}{2}\text{K} + \frac{1}{2}\text{NH}_4)\text{SO}_3$.

taŷ'-rə, s. [Native name.]

Zool.: Galera barbara, a small carnivorous mammal, about the size of a marten, from tropical America. Its color is uniform black, slightly tinged with brown, with a white patch on the throat and upper part of the chest. In a wild state it burrows in the ground; it is easily tamed, and becomes a lively and amusing pet in captivity.

tă-zēl, s. [TEASEL.]

tăz'-nĭte, s. [After Tazna, Bolivia, where found; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Mineral.: An amorphous mineral with somewhat fibrous structure, sometimes earthy; color, yellow. It is of apparently uncertain composition, but is regarded as an arseno-antimonate of bismuth, analogous to bindheimite (q. v.), and requires further examination.

taz'-zə (first z as t), subst. [Ital.] A flat cup with a foot and handles.

T'-bānd-age (age as ĭg), s. [The letter T, and Eng. bandage.]

Surg.: A bandage shaped like the letter T, consisting of a strip of linen attached at right angles to another strip. When two such strips are so attached it is a double T. Used in supporting dressings in diseases of the perinæum, groin, &c.

T'-bēard, s. [The letter T, and Eng. beard.] A beard cut in the shape of a T.

təha'-lan (t silent), s. [Chinese.] A blue powder containing copper, used by the Chinese for producing blue colors on porcelain.

təhēr'-nō-zēm (t silent), s. [Russ.]

Geol.: A black soil of a particularly rich character, extending at intervals from the Volga to near the mouth of the Danube, and even to Podolia and East Galicia. It is analogous to the regur of India. In the opinion of Sir Roderick Murchison (Russia, &c., p. 597) it is of aqueous origin.

təhēt'-wēr-tāk (t silent, w as v), s. [Russ.] A Russian silver coin worth 25 copecks, or about 20 cents American currency.

təhĭck (t silent), s. [See def.]

1. A sound produced by pressing the tongue against the roof of the mouth, and withdrawing it suddenly; used to quicken a lazy horse.

2. An exclamation of surprise or of contempt.

Təhū'-dī (t silent), s. [Russ.] A name given by the Russians to the Finnic races in the northwest of Russia. It is now more generally applied to designate the group of peoples of which the Finns, the Estonians, the Livonians, and the Laplanders are members.

Təhū'-dĭc (t silent), a. [TCHUDI.] Of or pertaining to the Tchudi; specif., designating that group of Turanian tongues spoken by the Finns, Estonians, Livonians, and Laplanders.

T'-cloth, subst. [See def.] A plain cotton cloth manufactured in Europe for the Indian and Chinese market, and so called for having a T stamped on it.

tēa, teē, cha, chau, s. [Chinese té, ch'a, ts'a; Fr. thé; Ger. thee; Ital. cia; Malay téh. Formerly pronounced tay; Pope used it to rhyme with obey (Rape of the Lock, iii. 7), away (Ib. i. 62), and stay (Basset Table, 27), though in the last-named poem (112) he makes it rhyme with decree.]

1. Chem. & Comm.: The prepared leaves of Thea sinensis, an evergreen closely allied to the Camellia family. The leaves are gathered four times during the year, the tea prepared from the first or spring gathering being the most delicate in color and flavor. Formerly it was supposed that black and green teas were prepared from the leaves of different plants, but it is now known that both varieties are obtained from the same plant, the differences depending on the mode of preparation. In preparing green teas the leaves are gently heated in drying-pans, to render them soft and flaccid, then rolled by the hand on a wooden table, this operation being repeated several times as quickly as possible, to prevent fermentation and preserve the green color. The leaves intended for black tea are placed in heaps to undergo fermentation. At the end of three or four hours they are tossed about and beaten by the hand until they become soft. They are next heated in an iron pan, and rolled into balls by the hand, this operation being repeated several times; lastly, the leaves are slowly dried over a charcoal fire. The two great classes of tea, green and black, are each subdivided into a variety of kinds, known in commerce by particular names. Thus, in green teas there are Gunpowder, Hyson, Young Hyson, Imperial, Twankay, &c.; and in black teas, Congou, Kaisow, Moning, Souchong, Assam, &c. The most important, soluble organic substances existing in tea are an alkaloid theine (q. v.), an essential oil present in very small quantity, and to which the peculiar aroma of the tea is said to be due, and tannic acid. Green tea contains on an average 26 per cent of tannic acid, black tea about 15 per cent.

Tea must not be regarded as a nutrient in the sense of supplying material to build up wasted tissue, or to generate heat, but it is chiefly prized on account of its refreshing and stimulating properties, and its power of engendering activity of thought, and driving away sleep. Taken in excess it is apt to produce giddiness and nervousness. Of late years an extensive fraud has been practiced upon the tea-drinking public by the Chinese. Exhausted leaves—that is, leaves which have already been infused—were taken and treated with iron filings, which had the effect of restoring to them their dark color. These were then dried, prepared in the usual way, and packed for export, but, though they looked all right, it was clear that such teas were neither useful nor wholesome. Both Great Britain and the United States have for years taken special precautions against the importation of adulterated teas; Canada has done likewise.

2. Hist.: Tea was used in China from early times, and is mentioned as a common beverage in that country by Soliman, an Arabian merchant, who wrote an account of his travels thither about A. D. 850. The first mention of it by a European was by Bolero in 1590. About 1610 the Dutch first brought it to England. The imposition by the Home Government of a duty on tea imported into America led to the destruction of many boxes of it in Boston and New York, and was one of the causes that brought on the American War of Independence.

3. The evening meal, at which tea is generally served.

4. A decoction or infusion of the leaves of the tea-plant in boiling water, used as a beverage, generally mixed with milk or cream, and sweetened with sugar.

5. An infusion or decoction of vegetables for drinking, as sage-tea, camomile-tea, &c.

6. A soup or extract of beef; as, beef-tea.

1. A garden, attached to a place of entertainment, where tea is served.

2. A garden in which tea is grown.

¶ Some fine specimens of American tea are raised in Georgia, and the results of the sales indicate that the culture of this crop in parts of the South will become of great importance. It is not generally known that attempts were made to establish tea-gardens there before the war, and that since the end of that outbreak systematic efforts have been made to revive the old gardens. The State Agricultural College of Georgia has been instrumental in spreading information among farmers concerning the culture of tea.

tea-kettle, s. An ordinary piece of stove-furniture for boiling water for making tea, &c.

Tea-kettle broth: Bread cut in small dice and soaked in hot water, to which butter, pepper and salt are added.

tea-lead, subst. Thin sheet-lead used to line the chests in which tea is sent over from China.

tea-oil, s.

1. An excellent table oil expressed from the seeds of Camellia oleifera, growing in China.

2. The oil of the tea-plant (q. v.).

tea-plant, s.

Bot. & Hort.: Thea sinensis, or chinensis, from which T. assamica is not distinct. Griffith called it Camellia theifera. It is wild in Assam, and possibly so in China, though the exact locality may be unknown, or the Chinese cultivated plant may have come originally from Assam. Formerly Thea viridis and Thea bohea were believed to be two distinct species, now they are regarded as varieties only. T. sinensis, var. viridis, is a large shrub with spreading branches, thin, nearly membranous, broadly lanceolate, light green, wavy leaves, with irregular serratures, and large, usually solitary, flowers. It was introduced into Europe in 1768. T. sinensis, var. bohea, is a smaller plant, with an erect stem; elliptical, flat, coriaceous, dark green leaves, with small serratures. It is not so hardy as the former variety. T. sinensis, var. assamica, is a shrub with thin gray bark, large leaves, and one to five flowers on a twig. It is cultivated in Assam, Darjeeling, Cachar, Chittagong, the Nilgiri hills, Ceylon, &c. An oil is made in India from the seeds. It is not suitable for food or for lights, but can be used in the manufacture of soap.

tea-pot, s. A vessel with a handle and spout, in which tea is infused, and from which it is poured into tea-cups.

tea-room, s. A room where tea is served.

"Stop in the tea-room. Take your sixpenn'orth. They lay on hot water, and call it tea."—Dickens: Pickwick, ch. xxxv.

tea-saucer, s. A small saucer in which a tea-cup is set.

tea-set, tea-service, subst. A complete set of utensils required for the tea-table; tea-things.

tea-spoon, s. A small spoon used in drinking tea and other beverages.

tea-spoonful, s. As much as a teaspoon will hold; specif., in medicine, about a fluid drachm.

tea-table, s. A table on which tea-things are set, or at which tea is drank.

"The scandal of a modern tea-table differs widely from the scandal of former times."—Goldsmith: Essay 5.

tea-taster, s. A person employed to test the qualities of teas by tasting their infusions.

tea-things, s. pl. A tea-service.

tea-tray, s. A tray on which to set a tea-service.

A. Transitive:

1. To impart instruction to; to educate, to instruct; to guide or conduct through a course of studies; to impart knowledge or skill to.

"I am too sudden bold;

To teach a teacher ill besemeth me."

Shakesp.: Love's Labor's Lost, ii. 1.

2. To impart the knowledge of; to give intelligence or information concerning; to instruct a person in the knowledge, use, management, or handling of; to cause or enable a person to learn or acquire skill in; as, to teach Latin, to teach music. It is frequently followed (as in Latin, Greek, &c.) by two objectives, the one of the person and the other of the thing; as, to teach a person Latin; and, in the passive, one of the objectives is retained, as, He was taught Latin; Latin was taught him.

"And gyf ge nolle Englysshe men Gode's lawe teche,

And vorth myd me among hem Cristendom preche."

R. Gloucester, p. 234.

3. To cause to be known; to show, to tell.

"He learned to sin, and thon didst teach the way."

Shakesp.: Rape of Lucrece, 630.

4. To make to know how; to show how.

"They have taught their tongue to speak lies."—Jerem. ix. 5.

B. Intrans.: To perform the duties of a teacher; to give instruction.

"For though thei speake and teche welle, Thei done them selfe therof no dele."

Gower: C. A. (Prol.)

tēaĉh, teache, s. [Fr.]

Sugar: The smallest evaporating-pan and the one nearest the furnace front.

"After an hour's repose the clarified liquor is ready to be drawn off into the last and largest in the series of evaporating pans. In the British colonies, these are merely numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, beginning at the smallest, which hangs right over the fire, and is called the teache, because in it the trial of the syrup by touch is made."—Ure: Dictionary of Arts, &c.

tēaĉh'-a-ble, a. [Eng. teach; -able.]

1. Capable of being taught.

2. Apt to learn; readily receiving instruction; docile.

"It might very well become them to be modest and teachable till they do."—Scott: Christian Life, pt. ii., ch. iii.

tēaĉh'-a-ble-nēss, s. [Eng. teachable; -ness.] The quality or state of being teachable; willingness to learn or to be instructed; aptness to learn; docility.

tēak, s. [Tamil tekku, tek; Telugu teku; Gond teka; Canarese tegga; Cinghalese tekka=the teak-tree. (See def.)]

1. Botany: Tectona grandis. A large tree with leaves from one to two feet long by eight to sixteen inches broad; wild in Central and Southern India and in Burmah, and cultivated in Assam, Bengal, and the Sub-Himalayas as far north as Saharunpoor. The leaves yield a red dye, and the wood an oil used medicinally and, either alone or mixed with resin, is employed as a varnish for woodwork. A resin exudes from the bark. The flowers and seeds are diuretic, and the bark astringent.

2. Comm.: Its timber. The sapwood is white and mealy; the heart-wood, when cut green, has a pleasant and strong aromatic fragrance, and is of a beautiful dark golden-yellow color, which on seasoning darkens into brown, mottled with darker streaks. It is exceedingly strong and weighs about 40 lbs. per cubic foot. It does not split, crack, warp, shrink, or alter its shape when once seasoned; contact with iron does not injure it, nor is it attacked by white ants; these qualities arising, perhaps, from the aromatic oil which it contains. It is easily worked, and takes a good polish, and is the most valuable timber known in India and Burmah, being used for house and shipbuilding, furniture, sleepers, &c., and largely exported for shipbuilding and for the construction of railway carriages. (Calcutta Exhib. Rep.)

tēal, teale, tele, s. [Skeat considers it English=(1) a brood; (2) a teal; cogn. with Dut. telg=a plant; Low Ger. teling=progeny; A. S. telga=a branch.]

Ornith.: A popular name for any individual of the genus Querquedula (q. v.). They are the smallest of the Ducks, and widely distributed over the world, generally frequenting rivers and lakes, and feeding, principally at night, on aquatic insects, worms, small mollusks and vegetable matter. The Common Teal, Querquedula crecca, is plentiful in most parts of Europe; length is about fourteen inches, head of male brownish-red, the body transversely undulated with dusky lines, white line above and another below the eye, speculum black and green. It nests on the margins of lakes or rivers, collecting a mass of vegetable matter, lining it with down, and laying eight or ten eggs. The flesh is extremely delicate, and the bird might be advantageously introduced into the poultry yard. Q. circia is the Garganey (q. v.), or Summer Teal; Q. carolinensis, the Green-winged Teal, of this country, closely resembles the Common Teal, but has a white crescent in front of the bend of the wings; Q. discors, with the same habitat, is the Blue-winged Teal. Aix galericulata, the Mandarin-duck (q. v.), is sometimes called the Chinese Teal.

1. Botany, &c.:

(1) The genus Dipsacus (q. v.). About 150 species are known, natives of the temperate parts of the Old World and of America. This order consists of herbaceous and half-shrubby exogenous plants with opposite or whorled leaves, and flowers in heads. The only valuable species of the order, Dipsacus fullonum, Fuller's Teasel, is four feet high, the bracts hooked, the flowers oval, pale purple or whitish. It is probably only a variety of D. sylvestris. It grows best in a stiff loam. The crooked awns or chaffs are fixed around the circumference of large broad wheels or cylinders, and woolen cloth is held against them. They raise a nap upon it which is afterward cut level. A piece of fine broad cloth requires 1,500 to 2,000 of them to bring out the nap, after which the teasels are broken and useless. Steel substitutes for teasels have been tried, but ineffectually; they are not sufficiently pliant, and tear the fine fibers of the cloth.

(2) The burr of the plant.

2. Mech. & Cloth Manuf.: Any contrivance used as a substitute for teasels in the dressing of woolen cloth.

teasel-frame, s. A frame or set of iron bars in which teasel-heads are fixed for raising a nap or pile on woolen cloth.

Entom.: A genus of typical Carabidæ. Tefflus megerlei, from Senegal and the Guinea Coast, is two inches long.

tēg, tēgg, s. [Cf. Wel. teg=clear, fair, beautiful, fine.]

1. A female fallow-deer; a doe in the second year.

2. A young sheep, older than a lamb.

"On Dec. 29 I had 300 lambs (called usually tegs after New Year's Day) in a yard."—Field, Feb. 16, 1886.

tēg'-ēn-ār'-ī-a, s. [Formed from Lat. Tegea; Gr. Tegea=a town in Arcadia.]

Zoöl.: The typical genus of Tegenariidæ (q. v.). It contains the House-spider, under which their appear to have been confounded two species: Tegenaria domestica and T. civilis, the former with proportionately longer legs than the latter. It is, besides, rather more than half an inch long, while the other one is rather less. They weave their webs in the corners of windows, of neglected rooms, or outhouses. They live about four years, and deposit their eggs in lenticular cocoons of white silk, and again in a silk bag disguised by plaster, &c.

tēg'-ēn-a-rī'-ī-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. tegenari(a); fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Zoöl.: A family of Spiders, tribe Dipneumones and its Sedentary Division. The ocelli are in two rows, the first pair of legs usually the longer; the web irregular. Sometimes there are three claws. It is a large family, in some classifications divided into the sub-families Drassides, Dysderides, Scytodides, Ciniffonides, and Agelenides.

tēg'-mēn (pl. tēg'-mīn-a), subst. [Lat. tegmen, tegimen, tegumen=a covering.] [TEGMENT.]

Botany:

1. Brongniart's appellation for the secundine of an ovule.

2. Mirbel's name for the inner coat of a seed.

3. Palisot de Beauvois' appellation for the exterior glume of a grass.

tēg'-mēnt, tēg'-ū-mēnt, s. [Lat. tegumentum, from tego=to cover.] A cover or covering; specif., a natural covering as of an animal or plant; integument; as—

I. Of the form tegment:

1. Anatomy: The upper part of the crura cerebri, consisting principally of the fasciculus teres and the posterior pyramid.

2. Bot. (pl.): The scales of a bud. They may be foliaceous, or may resemble petioles, stipules, or fulcra.

II. Of the form tegument:

Entom.: The covering of the wings of orthopterous insects.

tēg-mēn'-tūm (pl. tēg-mēn'-tā), subst. [Lat.] The same as TEGMENT (q. v.).

tē-guēx'-īn, s. [Native name.]

Zoöl.: A popular name for any individual of the Tejidæ (q. v.), specif. Tejus teguexin, with a wide geographical range in South America. It is from three to four feet long, black on upper surface, sprinkled with yellow, tail mingled with yellow and black, lower parts similarly marked. These lizards are found in sugar plantations, and among scrub and brush; they can swim well, but do not take readily to the water. The legend that they utter a warning sound on the approach of wild beasts (whence they are sometimes called Safeguards) is apparently without foundation. They feed on fruit, insects, snakes, frogs, birds' eggs, and young birds.

tēg'-ū-lā (pl. tēg'-ū-læ), s. [Lat.=a tile.]

1. Build.: A roofing-tile.

2. Entom.: A callosity at the origin of the fore wings of the Hymenoptera.

tēg'-ū-lar, a. [TEGULA.] Pertaining to a tile; resembling a tile; consisting of tiles.

tēg'-ū-lar-lŷ, adv. [Eng. tegular; -ly.] In the manner of tiles on a roof.

tēg'-ū-lāt-ēd, adj. [Lat. tegula=a tile.] Composed of small plates overlapping like tiles. (Said of a particular kind of ancient armor.)

tēg'-ū-mēnt, s. [TEGMENT.]

tēg'-ū-mēnt'-a-rŷ, adj. [Eng. tegument; -ary.] Pertaining to teguments; consisting of teguments.

tē-heē, s. & interj. [From the sound.]

A. As subst.: A laugh, a titter.

"Our poor young prince gets his opera plaudits changed into mocking tehees, and cannot become grand-admiral."—Carlyle: French Revolution, pt. i., bk. ii., ch. v.

B. As interj.: A word used to denote a laugh.

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camēl, hēr, thēre; pine, pīt, sīre, sīr, marīne; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rūle, fūll; trŷ, Sŷrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

tē-heē', v. i. [TEHEE, s.] To laugh contemptuously, to titter.

"That laugh'd and teheed with derision,
To see them take your deposition."

Butler: Hudibras, III. iii. 132.

teh'-sil-dar, s. [Hind.] A native collector of a district acting under a European or a zemindar. (Anglo-Indian.)

Tē'-ī-an, a. [See def.] Of or pertaining to Teos in Ionia.

tē'-ī-dæ, s. pl. [TEJDÆ.]

Tē īg'-ī-tūr, phr. [Lat.=Thee, therefore.]

Eccles.: The first two words of the Canon of the Mass. The expression appears to have been also used to denote a book containing a portion of the Liturgy (McClintock & Strong), but it is not mentioned in the list of Liturgical Books given by Smith & Cheetham in Christian Antiquities.

tēll, s. [Fr. teil, from Lat. tilia=a lime or linden tree.] The lime-tree or linden.

1. Bot.: The same as TEIL (q. v.).

2. Script.: The Heb. elah is not the lime-tree, but is probably the Terebinth, as it is rendered in the R. V.

"A teil-tree and an oak have their substance in them when they cast their leaves."—Isaiah vi. 13.

tein, s. [THANE.]

tein-land, s. Thane-land.

teind, s. [Icel. tiund=a tenth, tithe, from tín=ten; Goth. taihunda=the tenth; Sw. tiende.] The name given in Scotland to tithes. They originated at a remote period; and at the Reformation John Knox contended that after allotting some provision for the displaced Roman Catholic clergy, the remainder of the teinds should be used for the support of the Protestant ministers, for universities and schools, and for the poor. Through the opposition of the aristocracy, the arrangement was but partially carried out. At the union between England and Scotland in 1707, the Lords of the Court of Session were appointed to be Commissioners of Teinds, and power was given them to determine "the transporting of kirks," as the population moved from one locality to another, the consent of three-fourths of the heritors in point of valuation being necessary to warrant the removal. In 1837 and 1838 there were laid before Parliament nine folio volumes of reports by a Commission appointed to inquire into church accommodation, &c., in Scotland. It reported that the parsonage teinds were held by the Crown, by universities, by pious foundations, by lay titulars (analogous to the lay proprietors in England), or by the proprietors of the lands from which they were due; they were in all cases eligible to pay the stipends held or which might be awarded by the Court of Teinds to the ministers, but that they could not be transferred from one parish to another.

"And Wednesday, we are to be heard in the great teind case in presence."—Scott: Guy Mannering, ch. xxxix.

¶ Court of Teinds, Commissioners of Teinds: A court in Scotland having jurisdiction over all matters respecting valuations and sales of teinds, augmentations of stipends, the disjunction or annexation of parishes, &c. Its powers are exercised by the judges of the Court of Session, as a Parliamentary Commission.

teind-master, s. One who is entitled to teinds. (Scotch.)

teine, s. [TEYNE.]

tein'-ō-scōpe, s. [Greek teíō=to stretch, and skopeō=to see, to observe.] l. name given by Sir David Brewster to an optical instrument, consisting of prisms so combined that the chromatic aberration of the light is corrected, and the linear dimensions of objects seen through them are increased or diminished. (Brande.)

teint, tēint, s. [Fr., prop. pa. par. of teindre (Lat. tinto)=to dye. [TINT.] Color, tinge, tint.

"Glazed colors have a vivacity which can never be imitated by the most brilliant colors, because the different teints are simply laid on, each in its place, one after another."—Dryden: Dufresnoy.

teint'-ure, †tēint'-ure, s. [TINCTURE.] Color, tint.

tē'-jī-dæ (j as y), tē'-ī-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. tef(us), te(ius); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Zool.: A family of Lizards, sub-order Cionocrania, with ten genera, from tropical and sub-tropical America. Scales small, granular, sometimes with larger tubercles, those of the belly oblong, quadrangular, in cross bands; large symmetrical scutes on head; tongue long, scaly, and bifid at end; dentition acrodont; no fold of skin along the sides.

tē'-jūs (j as y), tē'-ī-ūs, s. [Latinized from native name.]

Zool.: The type-genus of Tejidæ, with three species, from Brazil and Mendoza. [TEGUEXIN.]

tē'-lā (pl. tē'-læ), s. [Lat.=any woven stuff; a web.]

1. Anat.: A web-like membrane.

2. Bot.: The elementary tissue.

tela-choroidea, s.

Anat.: The choroid web, the membrane which connects the choroid plexuses of the two sides of the cerebrum. Called also velum interpositum.

tela-contexta, s.

Bot.: Parenchyma in which the cells are arranged in threads which cross each other irregularly. Found in Lichens, Fungi, and some Algae.

tēl'-ā-mōn (pl.

[Gr. =a bearer.]

Arch.: A male

column or pilaster

to support an entablature, in the same way as Caryatides or Atlantes.

tē'-lār-lý, adv. (From the Tepidarium at the Baths

[Eng. telar(y)];

-ly.) In manner of a web; acting after the fashion of a web. (Browne.)

tē'-lā-rý, a. [Lat. tela=a web.]

1. Of or pertaining to a web.

2. Spinning or forming webs.

"The pictures of telary spiders, and their position in the web, is commonly made lateral."—Browne: Vulgar Errors, bk. v., ch. xix.

tēl'-ās-pý-rīne, s. [Etym. doubtful, but prob. a bad compound of Eng. tellurium and pyrites.]

Min.: A variety of iron pyrites, containing tellurium, occurring at Sunshine Camp, Colorado, which is probably the same as tellurpyrite (q. v.). Named by Shepard.

tēl'-ē-ba-rōm'-ē-tēr, s. [Gr. tēle=afar, and Eng. barometer.] An instrument for recording at a distance, by means of electricity, the barometric readings.

tēl'-āu-tō-grāph, s. [Greek tēle=afar off, auto=self, and graphō=to write.] An instrument which will at any distance transmit accurately and to the smallest detail in exact facsimile anything that may be written or drawn on the transmitting device. Two instruments are used, one to transmit and one to record. Both are nearly identical in form, size, and general arrangement, and each carries a wide strip of paper controlled by a synchronizing device which causes the one to follow the movements of the other. On the transmitter anything can be written or drawn and the recording stylus of the receiving instrument follows the movements of the transmitting stylus or pencil and thus produces an exact facsimile of the writing or drawing.

tēld, pret. & pa. par. of v. [TELL.]

tēl'-ē-dū, s. [Native name.]

Zoology: Mydaus meliceps, the Stinking Badger; the sole species of the genus; a small, nocturnal, burrowing mammal, found only in Java and Sumatra, and living at an elevation of 7,000 feet above the sea. It is about a foot long, with a pig-like head, stout body, very short legs, and a stumpy tail; color, dark-brown, with a white band running along the back. Like the skunk, it has the power of ejecting an intensely fetid liquid from its anal glands.

tēl'-ē-grām, s. [Greek tēle=afar off, suff. -gram.] Formed from telegraph on the analogy of monogram, chronogram, logogram, &c. The word was first used in America in 1852, and was the subject of a long and learned discussion in the English newspapers previous to its adoption in that country. Several eminent philologists proposed the term telegrapheme instead. A telegraphic message or dispatch; a communication sent by telegraph.

"There is, as against the exact but surfeiting telegrapheme, our lawless telegram, to which is strictly applicable the maxim of the civilians, as regards a clandestine marriage, 'Fieri not debuit, sed, factum, valet.'"—Fitz-edward Hall: Modern English, p. 158.

¶ To milk a telegram: Surreptitiously to obtain and make use of a telegram intended for another. (Slang.)

tēl'-ē-grām'-mic, a. [Eng. telegram; -ic.] Of or pertaining to a telegram; having the nature of a telegram; hence, brief, concise.

tēl'-ē-graph, s. [Gr. tēle=afar off, and graphō=to write.]

1. In a general sense, the word telegraph includes all modes of communicating intelligence to a distance. The modes may be classified as: visible (as semaphores), audible, or tangible.

2. Specif.: [ELECTRIC TELEGRAPH.]

3. A message sent by telegraph; a telegram.

4. The same as TELEGRAPH-BOARD (q. v.).

5. A board used in signaling the number of runs made in a cricket match, the number of wickets down, and the runs made by the last batsman out.

¶ Modern researches in electrical science have multiplied the varieties of telegraph to an extent almost incredible. The principal systems now in use are the Automatic, the Dial, the Double Needle, the Duplex, the Duplex Bridge, the Differential Duplex, the Facsimile [TELAUTOGRAPH], the Harmonic Multiplex, Hughes' Printing telegraph, the Quadruplex, the Single Needle, Wheatstones', the Writing telegraph, and several systems for printing messages as received. The telegraph used principally in this country is the Morse. [ELECTRO-MAGNETIC TELEGRAPH.]

telegraph-board, subst. A board on which are hoisted or otherwise marked the numbers of horses about to run in a race, together with the names of their jockeys.

"When the race is all over we may look at the telegraph-board in vain to find her officially-printed number."—London Daily Chronicle.

telegraph-clock, s. An arrangement by which time is signaled to a number of different apartments in a building or to several buildings. This may be performed by electro-magnetic devices, or by mechanical means.

telegraph-dial, subst. A circle on which are arranged the letters of the alphabet, figures, &c., the hand or pointer being operated by electro-magnetic action.

telegraph-instrument, s. A moving mechanical device used in the electric circuit; a perforator, transmitter, receiver, relay, register, or what not. Among the chief instruments for the reception and transmission of messages are: The Sounder, in which the message is received by sound, the Wheatstone, the Bell, the A. B. C., and the single needle. In 1850 the average number of words transmitted per minute was sixteen. Now six messages can be sent in one direction, and five in another on a single wire, and a message can go round the globe in twenty minutes.

telegraph-key, subst. The vibrating-piece in a transmitting-instrument, which is touched by the finger to establish an electric circuit.

Bot.: Desmodium gyrans.

telegraph-post, s. A post for keeping the wires elevated above the ground and out of contact with all surrounding objects, excepting the insulators on the posts.

telegraph-reel, s. A device on which the endless slip of paper is wound on a recording telegraph.

telegraph-register, s. A recording-device at the receiving end of a circuit.

telegraph-repeater, s. A relay instrument for repeating messages over a long circuit.

telegraph-wire, s. The wire by which the electric current passes from one station to another, the metallic communication between stations, also connecting instruments, battery, and ground. Wire and instruments form the circuit. Wires are attached by binding-screws or terminals to telegraph instruments.

tēl'-ē-graph, v. t. & i. [TELEGRAPH, s.]

A. Transitive:

1. To transmit, convey, or announce, as a message, speech, or intelligence, by means of a telegraph, and especially by the electric telegraph.

2. To signal in any way.

B. Intrans.: To send a message by telegraph.

tēl'-lēg'-rā-phēr, s. [Eng. telegraph; -er.] A telegraph operator; one skilled in telegraphy.

tēl'-ē-grāph'-ic, a. [Eng. telegraph, s.; -ic.]

1. Of or pertaining to a telegraph; made, sent, or communicated by a telegraph.

"The delay in the transmission of telegraphic news from Madrid."—London Daily Chronicle.

2. Of the nature of a telegraph; used for telegraphing.

"Forty new automatic telegraphic instruments, each capable of telegraphing three hundred words a minute."—Queen, Sept. 26, 1885.

telegraphic-keyboard, s. The bank of keys of a printing-telegraph machine.

tēl'-ē-grāph'-ic-al, a. [Eng. telegraphic; -al.] The same as TELEGRAPHIC (q. v.).

tēl'-ē-grāph'-ic-al-lý, adv. [English telegraphic; -ly.] In a telegraphic manner; by means of the telegraph.

"[He] has telegraphically instructed the Servian representatives abroad."—London Evening Standard.

bōll, bōy; pōut, jōwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhín, bençh; go, gem; thin. †his; sin, aç; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f. -cian, -tian = shan. -tion, -sion = shün; -tion, -sion = zhün. -tious -cious, -sious = shüs. -ble, -dle. &c. = bəl, dəl.

tě-lěg'-ra-phist, s. [Eng. telegraph; -ist.] One skilled in telegraphy; one who works a telegraph; a telegraphic operator.

"The good service rendered by them as telegraphists during the late campaign."—London Daily Telegraph.

tě-lěg'-ra-phỹ, s. [Eng. telegraph; -y.] The art or practice of communicating intelligence by a telegraph; the science or art of constructing or managing telegraphs. [ELECTRO-MAGNETIC TELEGRAPH.]

těl-ei-cōn'-ō-graph, s. [Eng. tele(scope); Gr. eikōn=an image, and graphō=to draw, to write.]

Optics: A combination of the telescope and camera-lucida, invented by M. Revoil. The principle involved is that of allowing the image transmitted by the object-glass of a telescope to pass through a prism connected with the eye-piece. The rays of light that would in the ordinary use of the telescope be transmitted direct to the eye are refracted by the prism, and thrown down upon a table placed below the eye-piece. The distance between the prism and the table determines the size of the image projected on the latter, and it is easy for the observer to trace on a paper placed on this sketching-table the actual outlines indicated by the refracted light.

těl-lei-dō-sau'-rūs, subst. [Gr. teleios=perfect; eidos=form, and sauros=a lizard.]

Palaeontology: A genus of Crocodiles, sub-order Mesosuchia. It is akin to Teleosaurus, and, like it, is from the Fuller's Earth.

tě-lě-i-tỹ, s. [Gr. telos=end.] End, completion.

těl-ě-lěc'-trō-scōpe, s. [Gr. tele=afar off, Eng. electro, and Gr. skopeō=to see.] An electrical apparatus for transmitting over a wire and reproducing at a distance images of objects in their natural colors. It was invented in 1898 by Jan Szczepanik, of Poland. The teleelectroscope reproduces by means of rapid vibrations the single points of light and shade composing the pictures to be transmitted, and with these rapidly appearing points the eye of the observer at the receiving end of the wire constructs the consecutive outlines of the pictures in a manner similar to the reproduction of the movements of objects in case of the vitascope.

těl-ě-ma-nōm'-ě-těr, s. [Gr. tele=afar, and Eng. manometer.] An instrument for registering pressure at a distance by means of electricity.

těl-ě-m'-ě-těr, s. [Gr. tele=afar off, and Eng. meter.] An instrument for determining the distance of an object whose linear dimensions are known, from its apparent length or height, when viewed between two parallel wires of a telescope.

těl-ě-mi'-crō-phōne, subst. [Formed from tele(phone) and microphone.]

Physics: An instrument described at the Académie des Sciences, Paris, Jan. 25, 1886, by M. E. Mercadier. (See extract.)

"By telemicrophone the author understands a combined apparatus simultaneously producing the effects of the microphone and the telephone, and reversible like the latter. He has constructed instruments of this kind, for which he claims the following advantages over the ordinary microphone. The possibility of a double mode of transmission with the same apparatus; reversibility of the transmitter, whereby the reception is greatly simplified; reduction of the number of organs on the microphonic posts, and consequent diminution of the total resistance of the apparatus on the same line."—Nature, Feb. 4, 1886, p. 336.

těl-ě-mi'-crō-phōn'-ic, adj. [English telemicrophone(e); -ic.] Of or belonging to a telemicrophone (q. v.).

těl-ě-mi'-crō-scōpe, (1) s. [Formed from tele(scope) and microscope.] A device for magnifying portions of an image produced by a telescope in such a manner as to resolve and make visible details not revealed by the latter instrument. It was invented in 1897 by Dr. Elmer Gates of Washington, D. C., who has also made the device applicable for magnifying details of images produced by a microscope.

těl-ě-mi'-crō-scōpe, (2) s. A microscope having a telescopic adjustment tube.

těl-lēn'-gi-scōpe, s. [Gr. tele=afar off; engys=near, and skopeō=to see.] An instrument combining the powers of the telescope and microscope.

†těl-ě-ō-dāc'-tỹl-a, s. pl. [Gr. teleios=perfect, and daktylos=a finger.]

Palaeont.: A division of Ungulata suggested by Nicholson (Palaeont., ii. 319) for the Coryphodontidae, in which the feet are five-toed, at present placed with the Perissodactyles.

těl-ě-ō-lōg'-ic-al, a. [Eng. teleolog(y); -ical.] Of or pertaining to teleology; relating to final causes.

těl-ě-ō-lōg'-ic-al-lỹ, adv. [Eng. teleological; -ly.] In a teleological manner; according to the principles of teleology.

těl-ě-ōl'-ō-gist, s. [Eng. teleolog(y); -ist.] One versed in teleology; one who investigates the final cause or purpose of phenomena, or the end for which each has been produced.

těl-ě-ōl'-ō-gỹ, s. [Gr. telos=the end, and logos=a discourse.]

Philosophy:

1. A branch of metaphysics; the doctrine of final causes and of the uses which every part of nature was designed to subserve; the argument from design in proof of the existence of God. The expression "final causes" was introduced by Aristotle, and the extension which he gave to the idea of causation drew his followers away from studying the proper object of physical science. Bacon (de Aug. Scient., bk. iii., ch. v.) said on the subject: "Causarum finalium inquisitio sterilis est, et tanquam virgo Deo consecrata, nihil parit" (Inquiry into final causes is fruitless, and like a virgin dedicated to God, produces nothing). The context shows that his objection was not to the investigation of final causes in themselves, but to the supposition that this study was a branch of physics. It was, he said, the "second part of metaphysics." His objection to its introduction into physics was not merely that it violated logical order, but that it operated as a powerful obstacle to the study of physical causes. Descartes objected to the study of final causes, believing that to do so successfully was beyond the faculties of man; and most of the French philosophers of the eighteenth century for various reasons ignored teleology. Modern physical science confines itself rigorously as its name suggests, to the investigation of physical causes.

2. The doctrine of ends in morality, prudence or policy, and aesthetics.

"Every art is thus a joint result of the laws of nature disclosed by science, and of the general principles of what has been called Teleology, or the Doctrine of Ends, which, borrowing the language of the German metaphysicians, may also be termed, not improperly, the principles of 'Practical Reason.'"—Mill: Logic, bk. vi., ch. xii., § 6.

těl-ě-ō-phỹte, s. [Gr. teleos, teleios=complete, perfect, and phyton=a plant.]

Biol.: A plant composed of a number of cells arranged in tissues.

"A tree is an assemblage of numerous united shoots. One of these great teleophytes is thus an aggregate of aggregates of aggregates of units, which severally resemble protophytes in their sizes and structures."—H. Spencer: Prin. Biol. (ed. 1864), i. 109.

těl-ě-ō-saur, subst. [TELEOSAURUS.] A fossil saurian of the genus Teleosaurus.

"The Teleosaurs were preceded by Belodon."—Phillips: Geology (ed. 1885), i. 513.

†těl-ě-ō-sau'-rĩ-a, s. pl. [TELEOSAURUS.]

Palaeont.: A group of fossil Crocodiles, usually merged in the Mesosuchia of Huxley, or the Amphicoelia of Owen.

těl-ě-ō-sau'-rĩ-an, s. [TELEOSAURIA.] Any individual of the Teleosauria (q. v.).

"Has large praelachrymal vacuities like a Teleosaurian."—Quart. Journ. Geol. Soc., xxxi. 431.

těl-ě-ō-sau'-rūs, s. [Gr. teleos=perfect, and sauros=a lizard.]

Palaeont.: A genus of Mesosuchia. The jaws are very elongated, and have many conical teeth like those of the modern Gavials. The dermal scales are large, strong, and solid. From the Fuller's Earth. Species numerous.

těl-ě-ōst, s. [TELEOSTEI.] A teleostean.

těl-ě-ōs'-tē-an, s. & a. [TELEOSTEI.]

A. As substantive:

Zoology: Any member of the order TELEOSTEI (q. v.).

B. As adj.: Of or pertaining to the Teleostei.

těl-ě-ōs'-tē-l, s. pl. [Gr. teleos, teleios=perfect, and osteon=a bone.]

1. Ichthy.: In modern classifications a sub-class including the majority of the existing species. They correspond broadly with the Osseous Fishes of Cuvier and the Ctenoidei and Cycloidei of Agassiz. Heart with a noncontractile arterial bulb; intestine without spiral valve; optic nerve decussating; skeleton well ossified, with biconcave vertebrae; tail homocercal (though in early stages of its development it has a heterocercal form). They are usually protected by thin, imbricating ctenoid or cycloid scales, sometimes by bony plates, while in some the skin is naked. The gills are free, with one external opening protected by a gill-cover. As arranged by Dr. Günther, the Teleostei are divided into six orders: (1) Acanthopterygii (sub-divided into Perciformes, Beryciformes, Kurtiformes, Polynemiformes, Sciaeniformes, Xiphiiformes, Trichiuriformes, Cottoscombriformes, Gobiiformes, Blenniiformes, Mugiliformes, Gastrostiformes, Centrisciformes, Gobiociformes, Channiformes, Labyrinthibranchii, Lophotiformes, Tæniiformes, and Notacanthiformes); (2) Acanthopterygii, Pharyngognathi; (3) Anacanthini (sub-divided into Gadoidei and Pleuronotoidei); (4) Physostomi; (5) Lophobranchii; and (6)

Plectognathi. In Müller's classification, the Teleostei were also made a sub-class with six orders: (1) Acanthopteri; (2) Anacanthini (Sub-brachii, Apodes); (3) Pharyngognathi (Acanthopterygii, Malacopterygii); (4) Physostomi (Abdominales, Apodes); (5) Plectognathi; and (6) Lophobranchii.

2. Palaeont.: The Teleostei appear first in the Chalk, but the majority of the fossil genera are of Tertiary age.

těl-ě-ō-zō-ōn (pl. těl-ě-ō-zō-ā), s. [Gr. teleos, teleios=complete, perfect, and zōon=an animal.]

Biol.: An animal composed of a number of cells arranged in tissues.

těl-ě-pāth'-ic, a. [Eng. telepath(y); -ic.] Pertaining to telepathy.

těl-ě-pāth'-i-cal-lỹ, adv. [TELEPATHY.]

těl-ěp'-a-thist, s. [Eng. telepathy; -ist.] One who practices telepathy, or who is versed in the principles of telepathic phenomena.

těl-ěp'-a-thize, v. t. & i. [Eng. telepath(y); -ize.]

A. Transitive: To practice telepathy.

B. Intransitive: To affect the mind of a person at a distance by means of mental suggestion (q. v.).

těl-ěp'-a-thỹ, s. [Gr. tele=afar, and pathos=feeling.] The action of one mind on another at a distance and without communication by means of the senses; mental suggestion; mind reading; thought-transference. [SUGGESTION, 5.]

těl-ěph-ēr-āge, subst. [Gr. tele=afar; phero=to bear; suff. -age.] A system of transportation in which electric motors are supplied with energy from conductors, usually strung overhead, along the line of road. [TELEPHERAGE.]

těl-ě-phōne, s. [Gr. tele=afar off, and phōnē=a sound; voice.]

Physics: An instrument for transmitting sounds or speech to distances where such would be inaudible through aerial sound-waves. This definition excludes speaking tubes, which act simply by preserving and concentrating sound-waves. Telephonic action depends on the fact that sound-waves in air are capable of communicating vibrations to a stretched membrane, and if by any means such vibrations can be transmitted with true resemblance to another membrane at any distance, such receiving membrane will reproduce the sound. This capacity of a single vibrating membrane to reproduce the most complicated sounds, as of speech, is in reality the greatest mystery connected with the matter; all else relates to the mechanism of transmission only. The essential nature of the operation is well shown in the common toy telephone sold in the streets, in which the floors of two small tin cups consist of stretched membranes, or even of paper. The two membranes are connected by a long piece of twine. If now one cup be held to the mouth and spoken into, the voice communicates vibrations to the membrane. The stretched twine communicates similar vibrations to the membrane of the other cup, and if its cavity be held to the ear the sounds will be heard. This is the true mechanical telephone. The term is more commonly applied to the electrical telephonic apparatus so much used in modern life, but the principle is precisely similar. Such apparatus generally belongs to one of two main classes. The true inventor of the first was undoubtedly Philip Reis, who showed, in 1861, that variations in an electric current caused by a vibrating membrane could reproduce the necessary vibrations. Reis in this way transmitted musical sounds and even words; but his apparatus was imperfect, and it was reserved for Mr. Graham Bell to perfect that which is still commonly used and known as the Bell telephone, though it is the nearly unanimous opinion of electricians that Bell's patent has been held by courts of law to cover far more ground than is really due to him, much to the public detriment and to the hindrance of progress. Bell's telephone and its action may be understood on reference to the diagram, where d is a cylindrical steel magnet, surrounded at one end by a coil of wire, a, whose ends are connected by the wires e with the circuit, or line-wire. It will now be understood [MAGNETISM] that any change in the power of the magnet will cause currents in this wire. Near, but not touching, the magnet's end is stretched a very thin sheet of iron, b b, as a membrane, which is spoken to through the mouth-piece c. Thus made to vibrate, the iron membrane approaches to and recedes from the magnet; and as it acts toward this as an armature, tending to close the magnetic circuit, the effect is to produce fluctuating degrees of free magnetism, which again produce fluctuating or undulating currents in the line-wire. But if these fluctuating currents are received in a precisely similar instrument, they in its coil produce variable magnetic force in the magnet, and this reproduces vibrations in the second iron membrane, which reproduce the sound. The second class of instruments are based upon the Microphone (q. v.). If part of a galvanic current is composed of two or three pieces of matter (preferably charcoal) in loose contact, variations in the current produce variations in the contact pressure of the loose pieces, and the converse. Hence, instead of a vibrating membrane causing undulating currents by means of a magnet as in the Bell method, it may abut against such a series of mere contacts, and thus cause an undulating or variable current, which again is capable of the converse action. A microphone is thus capable, with more or less modification, of being used as a telephone, and the employment of either method is a question of practical conditions. The Bell telephone is independent of any battery, being self-acting; but its feeble currents are incapable of transmitting speech to a distance; hence most of the modifications in magnetic telephones have had the design of increasing the power, as by using both poles of the magnet, and in other ways. The microphone, on the other hand, uses the power of a battery in its circuit, but in some respects appears less delicately sensitive than the free membrane. In practice it is very general to employ some form of microphone as the transmitting or speaking instrument, and the Bell telephone, or one of its modifications, as the receiving or hearing instrument.

There are now many forms of telephone in use, the principal varieties besides those already enumerated being the bi-telephone, in which there are two receivers, one for each ear; the capillary telephone, in which electro-capillarity is used to produce telephonic effects; the chemical telephone, in which chemical or electrolytic action is utilized; the electrostatic telephone, which utilizes electrostatic disturbances in the reproduction of sound; the reaction telephone, in which two mutually reacting coils are used; and the thermo-electric telephone, in which a thermo-electric battery is used. The last-named telephone has never been used in practice. In 1892 a long-distance telephone was erected between Chicago and the larger eastern cities and has since been in successful operation.

telephone-booth, s. A closet or cabinet containing a telephone, employed for convenience and secrecy in telephonic communication.

telephone-exchange, s. A central telephone office.

telephone-exchange switchboard, s. A switchboard employed in a central office for readily placing any subscriber in connection with any other subscriber, or with some other telephone office.

telephone-meter, s. An instrument for registering the number of connections between telephone subscribers and the time or duration of the same.

telephone-subscriber, s. A term applied to a person who is connected by a telephone system with central telephone office.

telephone-tinnitus, s. Tinnitus-aurium produced by the constant use of the telephone.

telephone-transformer, s. An instrument for repeating into one circuit a telephonic message received on another circuit.

těl'-ě-phōne, v. t. & i. [TELEPHONE, s.]

A. Trans.: To send, communicate, transmit, or reproduce as sounds, a message, or the like, by means of a telephone.

B. Intransitive: To send, transmit, or reproduce sounds, a message, or the like, by means of a telephone.

těl'-ě-phōn'-ic, adj. [Eng. telephon(e), s.; -ic.] Of or pertaining to the telephone; communicated, transmitted, or reproduced by means of the telephone.

tě-lěph'-ōn-ist, s. [Eng. telephon(e); -ist.] A person versed in the telephone; one who operates a telephone.

těl'-ě-phōn'-ō-grām, s. [Eng. telephon(e), and suff. gram.] A message transmitted by means of the telephone; a telephonic communication.

těl'-ě-phōn'-ō-grāph, s. [Eng. telephon(e), and Gr. graphō=to write.] An instrument for receiving and recording a telephonogram.

tě-lěph'-ō-nŷ, s. [Eng. telephon(e); -y.] The art or practice of transmitting or reproducing sounds, communications, &c., by means of the telephone.

"Be the reasons what they may, it is unquestionable that telephony is in England still in its infancy."—London Standard.

těl'-ě-phōr'-i-dæ, s. pl. [Modern Latin telephor(us); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Entom.: A family of Beetles, now reduced to the sub-family Telephorinæ (q. v.).

těl'-ě-phō-rī'-næ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. telephor(us); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -inæ.]

Entom.: A sub-family of Lampyridæ, more elongated and narrower than the typical Lampyridæ. The legs are also longer; the head is not covered by the prothorax. World-wide in distribution. One genus, which connects the Telephorinæ with the Lampyridæ, is luminous.

těl'-ě-phōr'-i-ŷm, subst. [Mod. Lat. telephorus (q. v.).]

Palæont.: A genus of Coleoptera akin to Telephorus (q. v.), from the Purbeck beds.

tě-lěph'-ōr-ŷs, s. [Gr. telos=end, and phoros=bearing.]

Entom.: The typical genus of Telephorinæ (q. v.). They are known to children, from their colors, as Soldiers and Sailors. They are seen in meadows on plants, but are carnivorous. According to De Geer, the female sometimes devours the male.

těl'-ě-phōte, s. [Greek tēle=far off, and phos (genit. phōtos)=light, rays.] An instrument for transmitting to a distance images of objects by the agency of electricity, selenium being utilized for this purpose.

těl'-ě-phō-tōg'-ră-phŷ, s. [Greek tēle=far off, and Eng. photography.] A process for transmitting to a distance images of objects by the agency of electricity acting on selenium.

těl'-ě-răd'-i-phōne, s. [Gr. tēle=far off, and Eng. radophone.] An apparatus by which M. Mercadier adapted Prof. Graham Bell's photophone to telegraphy.

těl'-ěr'-pě-tōn, s. [Gr. tēle=far off, and herpeton=a reptile, a creeping thing; herpō=to creep.]

Palæont.: A genus of Lacertilia, founded by Mantell on remains of a reptile which he called Telerpeton elginense, discovered in 1851 by Mr. Patrick Duff, in light-colored sandstone, once referred by some geologists to the Upper Devonian, but now held to be Triassic. The dentition seems to have been acrodont, and it differed from most existing lizards merely in having amphiœlous vertebæ. (Quar. Jour. Geol. Soc., viii. 100.)

těl'-ě-rŷth'-rîn, s. [Lat. tel(lus)=the earth, and Eng. erythrin.]

Chem.: A product of the decomposition of orsellinic ether when the ether, dissolved in hot water, is exposed to the air for several months. (Watts.)

těl'-ě-scōpe, s. [Gr. tēle=far off; skopeō=to see, to observe.]

Optical Instruments: An instrument for magnifying distant objects so as to make them look nearer the eye than they actually are. Its essential parts are: an object-glass or a concave mirror to render the rays of light convergent, and form an image of the object, and an eyepiece to magnify it after the manner of a microscope. About A. D. 1000, Gerbert of Auvergne viewed the stars through a tube in which, however, there were no lenses. Roger Bacon seems to have known that lenses in combination had a magnifying power. Dr. Dee, in 1570, speaks of "perspective glasses," apparently used in war to survey the enemy's forces. Jansen and Lippersheim, Lippershey, or Laprey, spectacle-makers at Middelburg, and Jacob Adriansz or Metius, seem to have first become aware of the power of instruments constructed like the modern telescope, and, on Oct. 2, 1608, Lippershey offered to the States-General three instruments "with which one can see to a distance." Galileo, hearing of this, divined how the result was effected, and constructed the Galilean telescope which had a double concave eyepiece, and made many astronomical discoveries with it, including the satellites of Jupiter. His telescope is still well known in the familiar opera-glass. Kepler first pointed out the advantage of making telescopes with two convex lenses, and Scheiner carried the suggestion into practice in 1650. De Rheita made a telescope with three lenses, and another of the binocular type. Huyghens made a telescope of 123 feet focal length, only the object-glass of which was in a short tube, and his was not the largest one existing. The unwieldy character of these huge instruments led to the discovery of the reflecting telescope, of which four types arose. The Gregorian telescope was invented by James Gregory in 1663, the Cassegrainian telescope by Cassegrain in 1672, the Newtonian telescope by Sir Isaac Newton in 1669, and the Herschelian telescope by Sir William Herschel about 1779.

Telescopes, it will be seen, are of two leading kinds—Refraction and Reflecting telescopes; in the former the image is formed by refraction through an object, glass, in the latter by means of a concave mirror or speculum. A refracting telescope in the simplest form consists of a double convex lens (the object-glass), and a second and smaller lens, also doubly convex (called the eyepiece). To render a telescope achromatic, the object-glass is made double or triple, and the eyepiece is generally composed of two lenses adapted to each other. Not only does a telescope magnify objects, but it collects and concentrates upon the eye a greater amount of light than would enter the organ if unassisted, and the larger the object-glass the greater in both respects is the power of the telescope; and a friendly rivalry exists between civilized nations as to which shall possess the most powerful telescope. One constructed by Mr. Howard Grubb of Dublin for the Vienna Observatory has an object-glass two feet three inches in diameter, and one made by Mr. Alvan Clark of Boston, Mass., for the Russian astronomers, is two feet six inches. The obstacle to further progress arises from the difficulty of forming a large disc of optical glass pure enough and uniform enough to be suitable for telescopes. This is the reason why reflecting telescopes have come into use. Lord Rosse's great reflecting telescope has a reflector of six feet in diameter, and can magnify an object 407 times without rendering it less bright than it appears to the naked eye. These large telescopes are for astronomical purposes. [EQUATORIAL, MERIDIAN-CIRCLE.] A refracting, astronomical telescope, having the eyepiece of a single lens, or of a pair of lenses, does not reverse the image formed by the object-glass, and therefore exhibits objects inverted, which does not much matter in astronomical observation. A terrestrial telescope, for looking at objects on the earth, has an eyepiece with two more lenses than an astronomical one; it therefore inverts the image and exhibits objects erect. All good telescopes are now Achromatic. [ACHROMATIC-TELESCOPE.]

The Yerkes Telescope, the gift of Mr. Charles T. Yerkes to the University of Chicago, is one of the largest refracting telescopes in the world. The column and head, of cast-iron, rise to a height of 43 feet, and weigh 50 tons. The polar axis, of steel, is 15 inches in diameter, 11½ feet long, and weighs 3½ tons. The declination axis, also of steel, is 12 inches in diameter, 11½ feet long, and weighs 1½ tons. The tube is of steel, 64 feet long, and 52 inches in diameter at the center, tapering toward the ends. Its weight is 6 tons. The lens is 40 inches in diameter. The driving clock, weighing 1½ tons, is located in the upper section of the column. It is wound automatically by an electric motor and is controlled by a double conical pendulum. It is geared to the main driving wheel, 8 feet in diameter, which, when clamped to the polar axis revolves it, together with the tube and all its accessories—all weighing 20 tons—in exact sidereal time. The total weight of the telescope is 75 tons. The site chosen is near Lake Geneva, Wisconsin, in order to avoid the smoke and other atmospheric impurities which prevail in Chicago and its immediate vicinity. Other remarkable American telescopes are those of Lick Observatory, with an aperture of 36 inches; Yale University, 28; United States Naval, 26; Leander McCormick, 26; Princeton, 23; Denver, 20; Smithsonian, 20; Dearborn, 18.5; Carleton College, 16.2; Warner, 16; Washington, 15.5, and Harvard, 15. The largest reflecting telescopes are those of Harvard College, 28 inches, and the Rev. Dr. John Peato, 22 inches. Though the Yerkes and Lick are the largest telescopes at present, Harvard College has the best equipped observatory for general astronomical work in America, and one of the best in the world. Other notable telescopes not yet (1894) completed are: A 50-inch objective for the Alleghany University; the Lowe telescope, 37½ inches, for the Lowe Observatory, Southern California; the new Chamberlain Observatory telescope (Denver, Col.), 38 inches. Prof. George A. Fargis, S. J., of the Georgetown College Observatory, has produced an instrument that is attached to the telescope recently completed for Georgetown College, that registers the time of the transit of the stars. Every movement of a star is carefully recorded by the photo-chronograph, as Prof. Fargis calls his instrument. It consists of two parts—a plate holder and an electro-magnet—so arranged that sensitive plates can be inserted close against the glass reticle into the photographic focus of the telescope's object-glass. A current is turned on when a star begins its transit and the instrument photographs its movements.

telescope-carp, s. [TELESCOPE-FISH.]

telescope-fish, telescope-carp, s.

Ichthyology: The most highly-prized of the many varieties of Cyprinus (Carassius) auratus, the gold-fish. The dorsal fin is absent, the tail is much enlarged, sub-triangular or tri-lobate, and the eyes which are large and protruding, are set in pedicels.

bōil, bōy; pōut, jōw1; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, ðis; sin, aș; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f. -cian, -tian = shan. -tion, -sion = shŷn. -tŷon, -șion = zhŷn. -tious, -cious, -sious = shŷs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bəl, ðəl.

telescope-fly, s.

Entom.: The dipterous genus Diopsis (q. v.).

telescope-shell, s.

Zoöl.: Cerithium telescopium. [CERITHIADÆ.]

telescope-valise, s. A valise made of two pasteboard boxes, one shutting down over the other and held in place by straps; commonly called simply a telescope.

těl'-ě-scōpe, v. t. & i. [TELESCOPE.]

A. Trans.: To drive or force the parts of into each other, like the sliding joints of a pocket telescope; said chiefly of railway carriages or other vehicles which come into collision. (Colloq.)

"Several of the wagons were telescoped, and much damage was done to the rolling stock."—London Daily Telegraph.

B. Intrans.: To move in the same manner as the movable joints or slides of a pocket telescope; specifically, to run or be driven together, so that the one partially enters or is forced into the other; as, The carriages telescoped.

těl'-ě-scōp'-ic, těl'-ě-scōp'-ic-āl, a. [Eng. telescopic (e); -ic; -ical.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Of or pertaining to a telescope; performed by the aid of a telescope; as, telescopic observations.

2. Seen or discoverable only by the help of a telescope.

"There are microscopical corpuscles in bodies, as there are telescopic stars in the heavens, neither of which can be discovered without the help of one or the other of these glasses."—Bolingbroke: Essay 1.

3. Seeing to a great distance; far-seeing; far-reaching.

"Turn eastward now, and Fancy shall apply To your weak sight her telescopic eye."
Cowper: Truth, 98.

4. Having the power of extension by means of joints sliding one within the other, like the tube of a pocket telescope.

II. Mach.: Constructed or composed of concentric tubes. (See compounds.)

telescopic-boiler, s.

Steam: A boiler formed of several concentric cylindrical portions.

telescopic-chimney, s.

Naut.: A chimney which is in sections slipping into each other, to be lowered in time of action, or, in certain river steamers, in passing beneath bridges.

telescopic-jack, s. A screw-jack in which the lifting head is raised by the action of two screws having reversed threads, one working within the other, and both sinking or telescoping within the base. By this differential arrangement greater power is obtained.

telescopic-lens, s. A compound lens suited for the eye or object glass of a telescope. Terrestrial telescopes, or spy-glasses, have two lenses more than astronomical telescopes, enabling an object to be seen in its natural instead of in an inverted position.

těl'-ě-scōp'-ic-āl-lý, adv. [Eng. telescopically; -ly.]

1. By means of a telescope.

2. In manner of a telescope.

"As many as four wagons nearly telescopically stove in were heaped on top of each other."—London Daily Telegraph.

těl'-ě-scōp'-i-form, adj. [English telescope, and form.] Having the form or construction of a telescope.

tě-lēs'-cō-pist, s. [Eng. telescopic (e); -ist.] One skilled in the use of the telescope for astronomical purposes.

těl'-ě-scō'-pī-ūm, s. [Mod. Lat.=a telescope.]

Astron.: A southern constellation, established by Lacaille. It is surrounded by Ara, Pavo, Sagittarius, and Ophiuchus. Its largest star is only of the fourth magnitude.

Telescopium Herscheli, s.

Astron.: Herschel's Telescope; a constellation named after Sir Wm. Herschel. It is in the Northern Hemisphere between Gemini, Lynx, and Auriga. It is not now generally admitted.

tě-lēs'-cō-pý, s. [English telescopic (e); -y.] The art or science of constructing or using the telescope.

těl'-ě-sēme, s. [Gr. tele=afar, and sēma=a sign.] An electric annunciator (q. v.) for use in hotels, &c.

těl'-ě-šī-a, s. [Gr. telesios=finishing, completing; Fr. télésie.]

Min.: A name given by Haüy to the pure varieties of sapphire (q. v.).

těl'-ěšm, s. [Gr. tesma=an incantation.] A kind of amulet or magical charm; a talisman (q. v.).

těl'-ěš-măt'-ic, *těl'-ěš-măt'-ic-āl, adj. [Gr. tesma (genit. tesmatos)=an incantation.] Of or pertaining to tesmas or talismans; talismanic.

"They had a tesmatical way of preparation, answerable to the beginnings and mediocrity of the art."—Gregory: Notes on Scripture, p. 41.

těl'-ěš-măt'-ic-āl-lý, adv. [Eng. tesmatical; -ly.] By means of tesmas or talismans.

"The part of Fortune found out, was mysteriously included in statue of brass, tesmatically prepared."—Gregory: Notes on Scripture, p. 32.

těl'-ě-spēc'-trō-scōpe, s. [Eng. tele(scope), and spectroscope.]

Optics: An instrument for observing the light from the planets and fixed stars, for ascertaining their physical condition and the composition of their atmospheres. It consists of a spectroscope placed at the end of a telescope, and containing two prisms, while the image of the star is brought to the slit of the spectroscope, which is one three-hundredth part of an inch in breadth.

těl'-ě-stēr'-ě-ō-scōpe, s. [Gr. tēle=afar off, and Eng. stereoscope (q. v.).] An instrument described by Helmholtz, in 1857, for producing an appearance of relief in the objects of a landscape at moderate distances. It consists of a frame on which are set at a convenient distance—say 4½ feet—apart two plane mirrors at an angle of 45°, which receive the rays of light from the objects; these are reflected to two central mirrors, forming an angle of 45° with the first, in which they are viewed by the eye. The effect produced is the same as if the eyes of the observer were at the same distance apart as the two larger mirrors. When objects at a great distance are viewed, they do not appear in strong relief, but rather as if detached from the general landscape.

tě-lēs'-tīc, *tě-lēs'-tīck, adj. [Gr. telos=the end.] Pertaining to the final end or purpose; tending or serving to the end or finish.

"I therefore call this the telestick or mystic operation; which is conversant about the purgation of the lucid or etherial vehicle."—Cudworth: Intell. Syst., p. 792.

tě-lēs'-tīch, s. [Gr. telos=the end, and stichos=a row, a verse.] A poem, in which the final letters of each line make up a name.

"Acrosticks and telestichs on jump names."

Ben Jonson: An Execration upon Vulcan.

těl'-ě-thēr-mōm'-ě-tēr, s. [Gr. tele=afar, and Eng. thermometer.] An instrument for registering at a distance by means of electricity the readings of a thermometer.

těl'-ě-thū'-ša, subst. [Lat.=the mother of Iphis. (Ovid: Met., ix. 682.)]

Zoöl.: A synonym of Arenicola (q. v.).

těl'-ě-thū'-ši-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. telethus (a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Zoöl.: An approximate synonym of Arenicolidae (q. v.).

těl'-fāir'-ī-a, subst. [Named after Mr. Telfair, superintendent of the Royal garden at Mauritius.] Bot.: A genus of Nandirobeæ. Known species two, Telfairia pedata [JOLIFFIA], a wood-climber, with a stem from fifty to a hundred feet long, growing in Zanzibar; and T. occidentalis, from Western Africa, where it is cultivated for the seeds, which are eaten. When expressed they yield a bland oil.

těl'-ic, adj. [Gr. telos=the end.] Denoting the final end or purpose. [ECBATIC.]

Tě-liñ'-ga, s. [See def. of compound.]

Telinga-potato, s.

Bot.: Amorphophallus campanulatus, cultivated in the Telinga or Telugu country for its edible roots or tubers.

tě-lī'-nī, s. [Native name (?).] (See etym. and compound.)

telini-fly, s.

Entom.: Mylabris cichorii, plentiful in most parts of India. It has been strongly recommended as a substitute for cantharides.

těll, *telle, *tell-en (pa. t. tellde, *telde, told, tolde, pa. par. told), v. t. & i. [A. S. tellan (pa. t. tealde, pa. par. teald)=to count, to narrate, from tal=a tale, a number; cogn. with Dut. tellen, from tal=a tale; Icel. telja, from tala; Dan. talle, from tal; Sw. tälja, from tal; Ger. zahlen, from zahl.] [TALE.]

A. Transitive:

1. To count, to enumerate, to reckon.

"And some grow rich by telling lies,
And some by telling money."

Praed: Chant of the Brazen Head.

2. To express in words; to communicate, to utter, to say.

"I will not eat until I have told my errand."—Genesis, xxiv. 33.

3. To narrate, to relate, to rehearse.

"I'll tell you my dream."—Shakesp.: Merry Wives, iii. 3.

4. To make known by words; to divulge, to disclose, to confess, to acknowledge.

"Tell it not in Gath."—2 Samuel, i. 20.

*5. To explain, to solve.

"Whoso asked her for his wife,
His riddle told not, lost his life."

Shakesp.: Pericles, Prol. 38.

6. With a personal object:

(1) To give information or instruction to.

"I told him of myself."

Shakesp.: Antony and Cleopatra, ii. 2.

(2) To order, to direct; to give orders or directions to; as, He told you to stay here.

7. To discern so as to be able to say or declare; to distinguish, to decide, to determine, to answer, to indicate; as, I cannot tell one from the other.

*8. To publish, to proclaim, to declare.

"And others seiden, he semeth to be a teller of news feendis, for he tee de to hem Jhesu and the aghenryng."
—Wycliffe: Dedis, xvii.

B. Intransitive:

1. To give an account; to make or give a report; to speak.

"That I may . . . tell of all Thy wondrous works."
—Psalms xxvi. 7.

2. To play the informer; to tell tales, to inform, to blab; as, If he does so, I'll tell. (Colloq.)

3. To take effect; to produce a marked effect; as, Every shot told.

¶ 1. I can tell you: Trust me; I can assure you. (Colloq.)

"They are burs, I can tell you."—Shakesp.: Troilus and Cressida, iii. 2.

2. To tell of:

(1) To declare, to proclaim, to speak of, to mention.

(2) To inform on or against; to tell tales of. (Colloq.)

3. To tell off: To count off; to select or detach for some special duty.

"Were told off to preserve a way clear of obstacles for the competitors."—London Daily Telegraph.

4. To tell on: To inform against; to tell of. (Colloq.)

"David saved neither man nor woman alive, to bring tidings to Gath, saying, Lest they should tell on us."—1 Samuel, xxvii. 11.

5. To tell one's beads: [BEAD.]

6. To tell up: To count up; to tell; to amount or increase so as to produce a certain effect.

*tělł, s. [TELL, v.] That which is told; a tale.

"I am at the end of my tell."—Walpole: To Mann, i. 265.

*tell-clock, s. An idler.

"Is there no mean between bnsy-bodies and tell-clocks?"—Ward: Sermons, p. 131.

tělł-lā-ble, a. [Eng. tell; -able.] Capable of being told.

tělł-lēn, s. [TELLINA.] Any individual of the family Tellinidae. (See extract.)

"The Tellens are found in all seas, chiefly in the littoral and laminarian zones; they frequent sandy bottoms or sandy mud, burying beneath the surface; a few species inhabit estuaries and rivers. Their valves are often richly colored and ornamented with finely sculptured lines."—Woodward: Mollusca (ed. Tate), p. 480.

tělł-ēr, s. [Eng. tell, v.; -er.]

1. One who tells, narrates, or communicates the knowledge of something; an informer.

"The nature of bad news infects the teller."

Shakesp.: Antony and Cleopatra, i. 2.

2. One who numbers or counts; one who tells or counts votes; specif., one of four members of any legislative body appointed, two on each side, by the Speaker to count or tell the votes in a division for and against a motion. One for the ayes and one for the noes are associated to check each other in the telling.

*3. An officer of the British exchequer, formerly also called a tallier. [TALLY.] They were four in number; their business was to receive all moneys due to the king, and give the clerk of the pell a bill to charge him therewith; they also paid all persons any money payable to them by the king, by warrant from the auditor of the receipt; and also made books of receipts and payments which they delivered to the lord treasurer. The office was abolished by 4 & 5 Will. IV., c. 15, and their duties are now performed by a comptroller-general of the receipt and issue of the exchequer.

4. An officer in a bank, whose duty is to receive and pay money over the counter.

tělł-ēr-ship, s. [Eng. teller; -ship.] The office or employment of a teller.

tělł-lī-a, s. [Prob. from Lat. tellus=the earth. (See def.)]

Ichthyology: A pseudo-genus of Cyprinodontidae, erected for the reception of such species of the type-genus Cyprinodon as have lost their ventral fins, either from living in limited localities or from their habit of concealing themselves in the mud. (Günther: Study of Fishes, p. 615.)

těl-lī'-nā, s. [Gr. tellinē=a kind of shell-fish.]

Zoölogy & Palæont.: The type-genus of Tellinidæ (q. v.). Shell ovate, oblong, rounded in front, angular behind; valves smooth or marked with radiating striæ. The animals have the power of leaping from the bottom by means of their muscular foot. The genus is cosmopolitan, most abundant in the tropics; more than 300 species have been described. Fossil species 170, from the Oölite onward.

¶ Tellina balthica crag or clay:

Geol.: A clay characterized by the abundance of Tellina balthica. According to some authorities, it forms the base of the whole glacial series, and indicates the setting-in of the great glacial subsidence.

těl-lī'-īng, tell-yng, pr. par., a. & s. [TELL, v.]

A. As pr. par.: (See the verb.)

B. As adj.: Operating with great effect; highly effective.

"Its authors . . . are stronger in the invention of telling situations."—Observer, July 27, 1885.

C. As subst.: The act of declaring, speaking, or uttering; in the plural, the act of declaring or divulging what ought not to be told, disclosure of a secret or what has been communicated in confidence.

¶ That's telling: That would be giving information which ought not to be given; that is asking one to blab. (Colloq.)

těl-lī'-nī-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. tellin(a): Latin fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Zoölogy & Palæont.: A family of Sinu-pallialia, with eleven species (Woodward), to which Tate adds three others. Shell equivalve, closed and compressed; cardinal teeth two; siphons separate, long, and slender, siphonal fold large; foot tongue-shaped. (See extract under TELLEN.) The family appears first in the Coal-measures.

těl-līn-īte, s. [Mod. Lat. tellin(a); suff. -ite.] A fossil Tellina (q. v.).

těl-lō-graph, s. [TELEGRAPH.]

těl-l-tāle, a. & s. [Eng. tell, v., and tale.]

A. As adj.: Telling tales; given to blabbing or telling tales; giving mischievous information. (Lit. & fig.)

"Make me not object to the tell-tale day."

Shakesp.: Rape of Lucrece, 806.

B. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. One who tells tales; one who officiously divulges the private affairs of others; one who tells what prudence should suppress; a tale-bearer.

"You speak to Casca; and to such a man

That is no fleeing tell-tale."

Shakesp.: Julius Cæsar, i. 3.

2. That which serves to interpret or manifest.

"Paint those eyes, so blue, so kind;

Eager tell-tales of her mind."

Matthew Arnold: Switzerland.

II. Technically:

1. Mech.: A name given to a variety of devices, usually automatic, for counting, verifying, detecting, or indicating; as,

(1) A turnstile having mechanism which indicates the number of persons passing through it.

(2) A clock attachment for the purpose of causing a record to be made of the presence of a watchman at certain intervals. A common form is provided with a rotating paper dial, showing the hour and minute at which the watchman touched a projecting stud which punctures the paper dial.

(3) A device attached to a station-meter to point out any irregularity in the production of gas.

2. Music: A movable piece attached to an organ to indicate when the wind is nearly exhausted.

3. Nautical:

(1) The same as TELL-TALE COMPASS (q. v.).

(2) An index in front of the wheel, or in the cabin, to show the position of the tiller.

4. Ornithology: An American name for Totanus flavipes and T. vociferus. So named because their shrill whistle alarms ducks.

telltale-compass, s.

Nautical: A compass suspended overhead in the cabin, with the face of the card downward, so that it is visible from below, and enables the captain to detect any error or irregularity in steering.

těl-l-troth, s. [English tell, s., and troth.] One who speaks the truth.

těl-lūr'-āl, a. [Latin tellus (genit. telluris)=the earth.] Of or pertaining to the earth.

těl-lū-rate, s. [Eng. tellur(ic); -ate.]

Chem.: A salt of telluric acid.

těl-lūr-ē-thyl, s. [Eng. tellur(ium), and ethyl.]

Chemistry: $\text{Te}(\text{C}_2\text{H}_5)_2$. Ethyl telluride; telluric ethide. A heavy, oily, yellowish-red liquid, obtained by distilling potassium telluride with potassium ethyl sulphate. It is very inflammable, has a disagreeable odor, and acts as a bivalent radical, uniting with chlorine, bromine, &c., to form compounds.

těl-lū-rēt'-tēd, a. [Formed from Eng. tellurium (q. v.).] Combined with tellurium.

telluretted-hydrogen, subst. [TELLURHYDRIC-ACID.]

těl-lūr-hy'-drate, s. [English tellur(ium), and hydrate.] [TELLURIDE.]

těl-lūr-hy'-dric, a. [English tellur(ium), and hydric.] Containing tellurium and hydrogen.

tellurhydric-acid, s. [HYDROGEN-TELLURIDE.]

těl-lūr'-ī-an, s. & a. [TELLURION.]

A. As substantive:

1. The same as TELLURION (q. v.).

2. An inhabitant of the earth; a mortal.

"So far ahead of us Tellurians in optical resources."—De Quincey: Joan of Arc.

B. As adj.: Of or pertaining to the earth.

"Hear the tellurian lungs wheezing."—De Quincey: System of the Heavens.

těl-lūr'-īc (1), a. [Lat. tellus (genit. telluris)=the earth.] Pertaining to or proceeding from the earth.

"As regards its breadth the tellurio movement went from the Lepontian Alps in the north to the Gulfs of Genoa and Lyons."—London Daily Telegraph.

těl-lūr'-īc (2), a. [Eng. tellur(ium); -ic.] Derived from or containing tellurium.

telluric-acid, s.

Chem.: H_2TeO_4 . A crystalline body obtained by fusing equal parts of tellurous oxide and sodium carbonate, dissolving the product in water precipitating by means of barium chloride, and decomposing with sulphuric acid. It has a metallic taste, reddens litmus-paper, and is freely, although slowly, soluble in water. The tellurates of the alkali-metals are soluble in water, the others are insoluble.

telluric-bismuth, s.

Min.: A name given to tetradymite, joseite, and wehrlite. (See these words.)

telluric-ethide, s. [TELLURETHYL.]

telluric-ocher, s. [TELLURITE.]

telluric-oxide, s.

Chemistry: TeO_3 . Obtained by strongly heating crystallized telluric acid. It is insoluble in water, and even in a boiling alkaline liquid.

telluric-silver, s. [HESSITE, PETZITE.]

těl-lū-rīde, s. [Eng. tellur(ium); -ide.]

Chem.: A salt of tellurhydric acid.

¶ Telluride of bismuth=Tetradymite, Joseite, and Wehrlite; Telluride of lead=Altaite; Telluride of silver and gold=Petzite; Telluride of silver and lead=Sylvanite; Telluride of nickel=Melonite.

těl-lūr'-ī-ōn, těl-lūr'-ī-ūm, s. [Latin tellus (genit. telluris)=the earth.] An apparatus for the purpose of illustrating to the eye the real and apparent movements of the earth; exhibiting the ellipticity of the earth's orbit; the position of the sun, represented by a lamp in one of the foci of that ellipse; the inclination of the pole to the plane of the ecliptic, and the constancy of the pole during the entire yearly revolution; the apparent movement through the constellations of the zodiac; the phenomena of eclipses, day and night, sunrise and sunset, and the seasons; the varying declination of the sun; the equation of time; the motions and phases of the moon; and affording a model whereon to illustrate the theory of the tides, lunar disturbances, &c.

těl-lū-rīsm, s. [Latin tellus (genit. telluris)=the earth; Eng. suff. -ism.] A modification of the hypothesis of animal magnetism, introduced by a German, Dr. Kieser, who attributed the phenomena to a telluric spirit or influence.

těl-lū-rite, subst. [Eng. tellur(ium); suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A mineral found as an earthy incrustation, or in small spherical masses with radiated structure, on the native tellurium of Transylvania. Composition: The same as tellurous acid (q. v.).

těl-lūr'-ī-ūm, s. [TELLURION.]

1. Chem.: Symb. Te, At. Wt. 128. An element of rare occurrence, found in a few minerals, in association with gold, silver, and bismuth. It possesses many of the characters of a metal, but bears so close a resemblance to selenium in its chemical properties that it is generally placed in the sulphur group. It has the color and luster of silver, is very brittle, a bad conductor of heat and electricity; specific gravity, 6.26; melts below a red heat, and volatilizes at a higher temperature. Like sulphur, it forms both oxides and acids.

2. Min.: Occurs in six-sided prisms with basal edges replaced; crystallization hexagonal. Has lately been found in more complex forms; more often massive and granular. Hardness, 2-2.5; specific gravity, 6.1-6.3; luster, metallic; color, tin-white; brittle. Composition: Tellurium and gold, with occasionally some iron. Originally found at the Maria Loretto mine, Transylvania, where it was melted for the gold it contained. Recently found, associated with various tellurides, in several of the United States.

tellurium-glance, s. [NAGYAGITE.]

těl-lūr'-ōūs, a. [Eng. tellur(ium); -ous.] Pertaining to tellurium.

tellurous-acid, s.

Chem.: H_2TeO_3 . A bulky precipitate prepared by dissolving tellurium in nitric acid of specific gravity 1.25, and pouring the solution into water. It has a bitter metallic taste, is slightly soluble in water, but soluble in alkalis and acids.

tellurous-oxide, s.

Chem.: TeO_2 . A semi-crystalline powder prepared by heating tellurous acid to a low red heat. It is fusible, volatile, and slightly soluble in water.

těl-māt-ō-lēs'-tēs, s. [Gr. telma (genit. telmatos)=a pond, a marsh, and lēstēs=a robber.]

Palæont.: A genus of Limnotheridæ, from the Lower Eocene of Wyoming.

těl-māt-or'-nīs, s. [Gr. telma (genit. telmatos)=a pond, a marsh, and ornīs=a bird.]

Palæont.: A genus of fossil Grallatores, akin to the Rallidæ, from the Cretaceous rocks of North America.

těl-ō-dy-nām'-īc, a. [Greek tēle=afar off, and Eng. dynamic (q. v.).] (See compound.)

telodynamic-cable, s. A means for transmitting power, originated by Hirn of Logelbach, in which high speed is employed to give the effect of great mass.

těl-ō-pē'-a, s. [Gr. tēlōpos=seeing to a distance, seen at a distance; alluding to the great distance at which its crimson blossoms can be seen.]

Bot.: A genus of Grevillidæ. Leaves entire or slightly toothed; flowers in terminal clusters, surrounded by an involucre. Telopea speciosissima, the Waratah of New South Wales and Tasmania, is a splendid proteaceous shrub, cultivated in green houses.

těl-ō-týpe, s. [Gr. tēle=afar off, and Eng. type.] A printing electric telegraph.

těl-phēr, s. & a. [TELPHERAGE.]

A. As substantive:

Elect.: The plant and rolling-stock of any system of telpherage (q. v.). The word was formed by the late Prof. F. Jenkin; but the example quoted under TELPHERAGE is the sole instance in which he used it as a substantive in the paper he read before the Society of Arts.

B. As adj.: Of or belonging to telpherage; moved or moving automatically by the aid of electricity.

telpher-line, s.

Elect.: A line on which transport is automatically effected by the aid of electricity; an electric railway; specif., a line worked by Prof. Jenkin's system of telpherage. The first line was opened at Glynde, England, Oct. 17, 1885, for the Newhaven Cement Company. It is a double line, nearly a mile long, composed of two sets of steel rails (a, a), supported on wooden T-shaped posts, about eighteen feet high. A wire is supported on each end of the cross-piece of the T, which is eight feet long. The carriers, or skeps (b), are of iron, and hold about two hundred-weight each; they are furnished with handles by which their contents are tilted over by a man with a pole, or automatically tilted by these handles coming successively into contact with a wooden arm standing out from the post where it is desired that the skeps should be emptied. Ten of these carriers, which are in electrical connection with each other, form a train, and in the middle of the train is an electric motor (d). About half-a-mile from the starting-point is the engine-house containing the dynamos, whence the current is led to the line, and so to the motor in the center of the train. A speed of four to five miles an hour is attained, and the working cost is about 5 cents per ton, the skips being empty on the return journey. The great practical advantage of a telpher-line is that it can be carried through a district without any interference with the fields, rivers, or roads, that cutting and tunneling are not necessary, and that no ground has to be purchased, as for ordinary railways and tramways.

těl'-phēr-age (age as ĭg), s. [Gr. tēle=afar off, and phērō=to bear. (See extract.)]
Elect.: (See extract.)

"In the first place it is necessary that I should define what is meant by the word telpherage, and perhaps that I should defend its formation. The word is intended to designate all modes of transport effected automatically with the aid of electricity. According to strict rules of derivation, the word would be 'telephorage'; but in order to avoid confusion with 'telephone,' and to get rid of the double accent in one word, which is disagreeable to my ear, I have ventured to give the new word such a form as it might have received after a few centuries of usage by English tongues, and to substitute the English-sounding telpher for 'telephone.'"—Prof. F. Jenkin, in Journ. Soc. Arts, xxxii. 648

těl'-sōn, s. [Gr. telson=a limit.]

Compar. Anat.: The last joint in the abdomen of the Crustacea. By some authorities it is regarded as a terminal somite without appendages, by other as an azygous appendage. The telson may be broad and spreading, as in the Lobster, or ensiform, as in the King Crab, while in the extinct Eurypterida its form was extremely variable. The name is also applied to the last joint of Scorpions, which has been modified into a weapon of offense.

tělt, pa. t. of v. [TELL.] Told. (Scotch.)

"Na, man—Jamie—Jamie Steenson—I tell ye before,"—Scott: Waverley, p. 89.

tě'-mēn, s. [Native name.] A grain measure of Tripoli, containing nearly six gallons.

tēm'-ē-rā, s. [Etym. doubtful.]

Ichthy.: A genus of Torpedinidæ (q. v.), from tropical and sub-tropical seas. The teeth are blunt, and the dorsal fins are absent.

tēm'-ē-rār'-ī-ōūs, a. [Latin temerarius, from temere=rashly; French téméraire; Ital. & Sp. temerario.]

1. Heedless or careless of consequences; unreasonably venturesome; rash, reckless, inconsiderate, headstrong.

"The theological faculty of Paris have condemn'd their doctrine as temerarious."—Bp. Taylor: A Discourse of Confirmation, § 1.

2. Careless, heedless; done at random.

"The wit of man could not persuade him that this was done by the temerarious dashes of an unguided pen."—Ray: Creation.

tēm'-ē-rār'-ī-ōūs-lŷ, adv. [Eng. temerarious; -ly.] In a temerarious manner; rashly, recklessly, heedlessly.

"Mine opinion and sentence . . . I do not temerariouŷly define."—Burnet: Records, vol. i., bk. iii., No. 21.

tēm'-ē-rā'-tion, s. [Lat. temeratus, pa. par. of temero=to pollute.] Pollution, contamination.

"The temeration of . . . popular preachers."—Jeremy Taylor: Sermons, iii. 312.

tě-měr'-ī-tŷ, te-mer-i-tie, s. [Fr. témérité, from Lat. temeritatem, accus. of temeritas, from temere=rashly, from the same root as Sansc. tamas=darkness, dimness.] Heedlessness or recklessness of consequences; extreme venturesomeness; recklessness, rashness.

"He soon became, unfortunately for his country, bold even to temerity."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xv.

tēm'-ēr-ōūs, a. [Lat. temere=rashly.] Reckless, rash.

"Temerous tauntress that delights in toys."

Vncertaine Authors: Agt. an Unstedfast Woman.

tēm'-ēr-ōūs-lŷ, adv. [English temerous; -ly.] Recklessly, rashly.

"Not that I temerouŷly diffine anything to come."—Bale: Image, pt. ii., fo. 69.

tēm'-in, s. [Native term.] A money of account in Algiers, equivalent to two cambes or twenty-nine aspers, about 17s. sterling.

Tēm'-mīnck, s. [C. J. Temminck, a Dutch naturalist, director of the Academy of Arts and Sciences at Haarlem, who from 1807 to 1815 published works on mammals and birds.] (See etym. and compounds.)

Temminck's bat, s.

Zoöl.: Scotophilus temminckii, about three inches long, varying considerably in color, generally dark olive-brown above, and reddish or yellowish white below. It has a wide range in the East.

Temminck's tragopan, s.

Ornith.: Cerionis temminckii. [TRAGOPAN.]

tēm'-nō-dōn, s. [Gr. temnō=to cut; suff. -odon.]

Ichthy.: A genus of Carangidæ, from tropical and sub-tropical seas. Body oblong, compressed, covered with cycloid scales of moderate size; mouth-cleft wide; strong teeth in jaws, smaller on vomer and palatine bones; no finlets; lateral line not shielded; anal and second dorsal covered with very small scales. Temnodon saltator, the Bluefish, is highly esteemed as food.

tēm-pē'-an, a. [See def.] Of or pertaining to Tempe, a celebrated and beautiful vale in Thessaly, described by the poets as the most delightful spot on the earth; hence, fig., delightful, enchanting, lovely.

tēm'-pēr, tem-pre, tem-pri-en, v. t. & i. [Fr. tempérer=to temper, from Lat. tempero=to appportion, to moderate, to regulate, to qualify. Allied to tempus=time; temperi, tempori=seasonably; Sp. temperar, templar; Port. temperar; Ital. temperare.]

A. Transitive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. To moderate, to regulate, to govern, to control.

"With which the damned ghosts he governeth,

And furies rules, and Tartare tempereth."

Spenser: Mother Hubbard's Tale, 1,294.

2. To reduce the excess, violence, harshness, or severity of; to qualify, to moderate, to soothe, to calm.

"O woman, lovely woman! Nature made thee

To temper man: we had been brutes without you."

Otway: Venice Preserved, i. 1.

3. To mingle, mix, or combine properly or in due proportion; to blend; to form by mixture; to compound.

"Then in a bowl he tempers generous wines,

' Around whose verge a mimic ivy twines."

Pope: Homer's Odyssey, xvi. 58.

4. To proportion duly as regards constituent parts; to unite or combine in due proportion; to adjust.

"God hath tempered the body together . . . that there should be no schism in the body, but that the members should have the same care one for another."—1 Cor. inth. xii. 24, 25.

5. To mix and work up.

"The potter, tempering soft earth, fashioneth every vessel with much labor."—Wisdom xv. 7.

6. To qualify by the intermixture or addition of something to reduce to due condition by combining with something else.

"I shall temper so

Justice with mercy, as may illustrate most

Them fully satisfied, and thee appease."

Milton: P. L., x. 77.

7. To form to a proper degree of hardness. [TEMPERING.]

"We must do as the smiths who temper yron."—P. Holland: Plutarch, p. 95.

*8. To fashion, to mold, to dispose.

"'Tis she,

That tempers him to this extremity."

Shakesp.: Richard III., i. 1.

*9. To warm.

"What wax so frozen but dissolves with tempering?"

Shakesp.: Venus and Adonis, 565.

II. Technically:

1. Founding: To moisten and work up to a proper consistency; as, to temper clay.

2. Music: To adjust, as the scale of tones or sounds of a fixed-toned instrument, so as to enable it to be played in any key; to raise or lower slightly as the various notes of an instrument, so that the intervals in each key shall be as far as possible equally agreeable. [TEMPERAMENT.]

*B. Intransitive:

1. To have or acquire a proper or desired state or quality; to become soft and pliable.

"I have him already tempering between my finger and my thumb, and shortly will I seal with him."—Shakesp.: Henry IV., Pt. II., iv. 3.

2. To accord; to act and think in accord or conformity.

"Few men rightly temper with the stars."

Shakesp.: Henry VI., Pt. III., iv. 6.

tēm'-pēr, s. [TEMPER, v.; cf. Lat. temperies=a tempering, right admixture.]

I. Ordinary Language:

*1. Bodily temperament; that constitution of body arising from the due blending or mixture of the four principal humors. [TEMPERAMENT I. 3.]

"The exquisiteness of his [the Savior's] bodily temper increased the exquisiteness of his torment."—Fuller: Pisgah Sight, i. 345.

2. Due mixture of different qualities; the state of any compound substance which results from the mixture of various ingredients.

"Nothing better proveth the excellency of this soil and temper, than the abundant growing of the palm-trees."—Raleigh: Hist. World.

*3. Middle course, state, or character; mean, medium.

"If the estates of some bishops were exorbitant before the reformation, the present clergy's wishes reach no further than that some reasonable temper had been used, instead of paring them so quick."—Swift: Miscellanies.

*4. Calmness of mind; moderation, self-restraint, temperateness.

"Oh! blessed with temper, whose unclouded ray

Can make to-morrow cheerful as to-day."

Pope: Moral Essays, ii. 257.

5. Disposition of mind; constitution of the mind, especially as regards the passions and affections.

"His temper, in spite of manifold vexations and provocations, was always cheerful and serene."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xiv.

6. Mood, humor, disposition.

"Thus the nation was in such a temper that the smallest spark might raise a flame."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. ii.

7. Heat of mind or passion; proneness or disposition to give way to anger, rage, or passion; irritability.

8. Habits, natural inclinations.

"Such as have a knowledge of the town may easily class themselves with tempers congenial to their own."—Goldsmith: Essays, i.

9. The state of a metal, particularly as regards its hardness.

"The hot pieces of iron he would hammer out . . . and harden them to a good temper as there was occasion."—Dampier: Voyages (an. 1683).

10. Quality.

"His courage was of the truest temper; his understanding strong but narrow."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xv.

11. An alloy used by pewterers, consisting of two parts of tin to one of copper.

II. Sugar-manuf.: Milk of lime, or its equivalent, added to boiling syrup to clarify it and neutralize the superabundant acid.

¶ For the difference between temper, disposition, and frame, see DISPOSITION.

temper-screw, s.

1. Well-boring: A piece by which the tools are suspended from the walking beam, and are lowered as the drilling progresses.

2. A set-screw for adjustment; one which brings its point against a bearing or an object.

tēm'-pēr-a, s. [Ital.]

Paint.: The same as DISTEMPER (2) (q. v.).

tēm'-pēr-a-ble, a. [Eng. temper; -able.] Capable of being tempered.

tēm'-pēr-a-mēnt, s. [Lat. temperamentum=a mean, moderation, from tempero=to moderate, to temper (q. v.).]

I. Ordinary Language:

*1. A compromise or middle ground on which two contending parties can meet; a medium between two extreme opinions; a middlecourse or an arrangement reached by mutual concession, or by tempering the extreme claims on either side, adjustment of opposing influences, or the means by which such an adjustment is effected.

"However, I forejudge not any probable expedient, any temperament that can be found in things of this nature, so disputable on either side."—Milton: Ready and Easy Way to Establish a Free Commonwealth.

2. State with regard to the relative proportion of different qualities or constituent parts; constitution; due mixture of opposite or different qualities; a condition arising from the proper blending of various qualities.

"Galen was not a better physician than an ill divine, while he determines the soul to be the complexion and temperament of the prime qualities."—Bp. Hall: The Invisible World, bk. ix., § 1.

3. That individual peculiarity of physical organization by which the manner of acting, feeling, and thinking of each person is permanently affected. Temperament, called by the Greeks krasis, meaning a mixture or tempering of elements, was anciently supposed to arise from the union of two or more of the entities, heat, cold, drouth, or moisture, corresponding to the so-called elements, fire, air, earth, and water. There were four temperaments recognized by Hippocrates, which he supposed to have arisen from the mixture of four secondary or compound elements, blood, phlegm or pituita, yellow bile, and black bile. Blood is supposed by him to be a combination of hot and moist, phlegm of cold and moist, yellow bile of hot and dry, and black bile of cold and dry. While his explanation is rejected, his four temperaments are fāte, rāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāl, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camēl, hēr, thēre; pine, pīt, sīre, sīr, marīne; gō, pōt. or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rāle, fūll; trŷ, Sŷrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

still recognized under the names of the Sanguine or Sanguineous, the Lymphatic or Phlegmatic, the Choleric or Biliious, and the Melancholic or Atrabilious temperaments. (See these words.)

*4. Condition, as to heat or cold; temperature.

"They do not provide [refreshments] in proportion to the fertility of the soil, and the temperament of the climate."—Cook: First Voyage, bk. iii., ch. xiv.

II. Music: In its broadest sense, the division of the octave; in a narrower sense, the modification of intervals from their strict mathematical value in order to secure a recurring and interchangeable series in consecutive octaves. The most common form of temperament is that now used on pianofortes and organs, known as Equal Temperament, in which the octave is divided into twelve equal parts called mean semitones; but in order to secure this, the fifths have to be slightly flatter than 3:2, and the thirds considerably sharper than 5:4. If thirds and fifths be required in just intonation, the number of keys on keyed instruments must be inconveniently multiplied; such instruments are sometimes called enharmonic. Systems of Unequal Temperament are such as secure perfect correctness in certain common keys at the sacrifice of the intonation of those more remote.

Sir Thomas Elyot, writing in 1534, says that the word was not then in general use.]

1. Moderation; observance of moderation; temperateness; specifically—

(1) Self-restraint; moderation of passion; patience, calmness. (Milton: P. L., xii. 583.)

(2) Habitual moderation in regard to the indulgence of the natural appetites and passions; abstinence from all excess, improper indulgence, or the use of anything injurious to moral or physical well-being; restrained or moderate indulgence; in a more limited sense, abstinence from or moderation in the use of intoxicating liquors. (Milton: P. L., xi. 531.)

*2. Chastity. (Shakesp.: Rape of Lucrece, 884.)

*3. Agreeable temperature; mild climate.

"It [the island] must needs be of subtle, tender, and delicate temperance."—Shakesp.: Tempest, ii. 1.

¶ Temperance is frequently used adjectively; as, a temperance society, a temperance meeting, &c.

temperance hospital, s.

Med.: A hospital in which alcohol is not used as a beverage, and is only employed very sparingly and under test conditions as a medicine.

temperance-hotel, s. A hotel where no intoxicating liquors are supplied.

temperance-movement, s.

Hist.: A movement designed (1) to minimize or (2) to abolish the use of alcoholic liquors as beverages. In the first sense the word "temperance" is used strictly, i. e., the aim at moderation in the use of liquors; in the second sense it is equivalent to total abstinence. The Jewish Nazarites and Rechabites acted on total abstinence principles (Num. vi. 1-21, Jer. xxxv. 1-6) [RECHABITE (1)], as did the Encratites (q. v.) of the second Christian century. Most of the higher Hindoo castes and all the Mohammedans nominally abstain from intoxicating liquor. The earliest modern temperance order was that of St. Christopher, founded in Germany in 1517, the members of which were pledged not to drink more than seven goblets of liquor at a meal, "except in cases where this measure was not sufficient to quench thirst." In 1600 the Landgrave of Hesse established another temperance order. America was earlier than Britain in the modern temperance movement. In 1651 the people of East Hampton, Long Island, endeavored to limit the sale of intoxicating drinks. In 1760 the religious societies began to protest against drinking at funerals; in 1789 a resolution was passed by farmers to abstain from liquor during that season; and in 1790 medical men, led by Dr. Rush, protested against the use of spirits, and four years later he recommended total abstinence. The first total abstinence pledge was drafted by Micaiah Pendleton of Virginia. In 1812 the Rev. H. Humphrey recommended total abstinence, as did Dr. Lyman Beecher, and various temperance societies arose. Not, however, till 1836 was the American Temperance Union formed on the basis of total abstinence. In 1840 the Washingtonians were founded in the city of Baltimore, and in 1842 the Sons of Temperance were instituted in New York City. From 1845 commenced the various orders with ritual and insignia, which have gradually been extended to or imitated in Europe. As early as 1818 a total abstinence society, believed to have been the first in date throughout the world, had been founded at Skibbereen, in Ireland. In England the movement began at Bradford, in February, 1830. The British and Foreign Temperance Society was formed in London early in 1831. On August 23, 1832, Joseph Livesey, then a member of the Preston Temperance Society, drew up the teetotal pledge, the first signers of which are known as the "seven men of Preston." This inaugurated the modern teetotal movement. In 1838 Father Theobald Mathew, a Capuchin friar, became the apostle of temperance for Ireland, and by the end of 1839 obtained 1,800,000 recruits to the cause. The United Kingdom Band of Hope Union was founded in May, 1855. In 1868 the Independent Order of Good Templars, probably the most widespread of all temperance organizations, was planted in England by Mr. Joseph Malins. In 1873 Cardinal Manning and Father Nugent commenced a vigorous temperance movement among the Roman Catholics. The feeling in favor of temperance is steadily growing, and the numerous societies with their large membership constitute a very potent social and political force.

The National Woman's Christian Temperance Union, with its auxiliary state and territorial unions, besides that of the District of Columbia, is the largest society ever composed exclusively of women and conducted entirely by them. It has been organized in every state and territory of the nation, and locally in about ten thousand towns and cities. Great Britain, Canada and Australia, Hawaiian Islands, New Zealand, India and Japan, Madagascar and South Africa, have also organized, and there are local unions in almost every civilized nation. This society is the lineal descendant of the great Temperance Crusade of 1873-4, and is a union of Christian women for the purpose of educating the young; forming a better public sentiment; reforming the drinking classes; and securing the entire abolition of the liquor traffic. In its political aspect the temperance question has in this country become one of grave importance, and has formed an issue in more than one political campaign in several states of the Union. Its advocacy has assumed different forms, ranging from partial restriction [LOCAL OPTION] to total prohibition [PROHIBITION]. In Maine, under the earlier efforts of the apostles of total abstinence, prohibition was carried as a measure of state policy, and the Maine liquor law formed the basis of subsequent similar enactments in other states. In several of the states local option exists, and in one—South Carolina—the state has assumed a monopoly of the liquor traffic, allowing no liquor to be sold except through the medium of dispensers appointed by the Boards of Control, said Boards of Control in turn being appointed by the Governor with the consent of the Legislature. To enforce this law the Governor has authority to employ special constables, whose pay shall be $2 per day. Iowa has a prohibition law the provisions of which, especially that portion relating to "original packages" has occasioned much litigation. It is a significant fact that, in the localities in which women are allowed to vote, prohibition is most firmly established as a matter of governmental policy, and intemperance and its consequent evils are at a minimum.

temperance-society, s.

1. A society pledging its members to temperance or moderation in the use of intoxicating liquors.

2. A total abstinence society, or, in some cases, a society on a double basis, so that a member may profess either temperance [1] or total abstinence. [TEMPERANCE MOVEMENT.]

"Now the first of these, and the foundation of all the rest, is a proper temperature of fear and love; two affections, which ought never to be separated in thinking of God."—Secker: Sermons, vol. ii., ser. 1.

*4. The temper of metals.

"Taking thereby the due temperature of stiff steel."—P. Holland: Plutarch, p. 95.

*5. Moderate degree of atmospheric heat; temperateness of climate.

"If, instead of this variation of heat, we suppose an equality or constant temperature of it before the deluge, the case would be much altered."—Woodward: Nat. Hist.

6. In the same sense as II.

II. Physics: Intensity of radiant heat. The temperature of any body is the extent to which it tends to impart sensible heat to other bodies. The temperature of a body may be altered by adding to it or withdrawing from it a certain amount of radiant heat. A cupful of boiling water taken from a boiler remains for a short time at as high a temperature as that in the larger vessel, but the limited amount of heat which it can radiate has a much less effect in raising that of other bodies. The temperature of any given body is determined by its specific heat (q. v.). For very high temperature it is usually measured by a pyrometer (q. v.), for ordinary temperature, by a thermometer (q. v.). (For the causes which regulate the temperature of the several countries, see Climate and Isothermal.) Temperature is often used in connection with the animal body. In the warm-blooded animals, birds, and bōil, bōy; pōut, jōw1; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, ðhis; sin, aș; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f. -cian, -tian = șan. -tion, -sion = șhũn; -tĩon, -sion = zhũn. -tĩous, -cĩous, -sĩous = șhũs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bēl, dēl.

mammals, the temperature of the body remains constant at 35° to 40° C., whatever be the heat of the air. The temperature of man is about 37° 6° C. (99° 7° Fahr.); in the wolf it is said to be as low as 35° 24° C., while in the swallow it is 44° C. In the cold-blooded animals it is but slightly raised above the surrounding air. In the frog it is rarely more than 04° to 05° C. above that of the atmosphere, and in a species of python it is 12° C., while Huber found that in the beehive it rose at times to 40° C. Plants as a rule do not greatly vary in temperature, from the surrounding atmosphere, except when they flower, when their heat rises some degrees. The probable cause is the increased absorption of oxygen and the formation of a large quantity of carbon dioxide. Minerals and rocks vary in their radiant heat, partly as they are exposed to external heat, partly according to the nature of chemical changes, if any, which they are undergoing.

"How much the temperature of the air varies here, I myself could sensibly perceive."—Cook: Third Voyage, bk. i., ch. ii.

temperature-alarm, subst. A mechanical contrivance which automatically makes a signal when the temperature of the place where it is located exceeds or falls below a determinate point.

tēm'-pēred, a. [Eng. temper, s.; -ed.]

1. Having a certain temper or disposition; disposed; usually in composition, as good-tempered, hot-tempered, &c.

"If I had not an excellent tempered patience, now should I break this fellow's head."—Beaum. & Flet.: Coxcomb, ii.

2. Subjected to and improved by the operation of tempering (q. v.); hardened.

"This sceptre, formed by tempered steel to prove An ensign of the delegates of Jove."

Pope: Homer's Iliad, i. 314.

tempered-glass, s. [TOUGHENED-GLASS.]

tempered-steel, s. [STEEL, s., II. 1.]

tēm'-pēr-ēr, s. [Eng. temper, v.; -er.] One who or that which tempers; specif., a machine in which articles are ground together, with the addition of a proper quantity of water, to intimately commingle them and develop the plasticity. Sand and lime thus tempered form mortar; clay thus tempered becomes fit for the potter's use.

C. As substantive:

Metal-work.: The process of producing in a metal, particularly steel, that peculiar degree of hardness and elasticity which adapts it for any of the purposes to which it is to be applied. The malleable metals generally increase in hardness by being hammered or rolled, and hammer-hardening—that is, hammering without the application of heat, is frequently employed for hardening some kinds of steel springs. Steel is for most purposes hardened by plunging it while hot into water, oil, or other liquid to cool it slowly. Nearly every kind of steel requires a particular degree of heat to impart to it the greatest hardness of which it is susceptible. If heated, and suddenly cooled below that degree, it becomes as soft as iron; if heated beyond that degree, it becomes very hard, though brittle; and its brittleness is an indication of the degree of its heat when cooled off. By the common method the steel is overheated, plunged in cold water, and then annealed or tempered by being so far re-heated that oil and tallow will burn on its surface; or the surface is ground and polished, and the steel reheated until it assumes a certain color. The gradations of color consecutively follow: a light straw-yellow, violet, blue, and finally gray or black, when the steel again becomes as soft as though it had never been hardened. Bronze is tempered by a process reverse to that adopted with steel. Cooling bronze slowly hardens it. The sudden cooling makes it less frangible, and is adopted with gongs. A method of tempering much practiced of late years is by the use of electricity, by means of which the article to be tempered is heated. For tempering wire this method is said to be superior, as the process can be continuously applied without intermission.

tēm'-pēr-lēss, *tēm'-pēr-lēsse, adj. [English temper; -less.] Without temper or moderation.

tēm'-plār, *tēm'-plēr, *tem-plere, s. & a. [Low Lat. templarius; from Lat. templum=a temple (q. v.); Sp. & Port. templario; Fr. templier.]

A. As substantive:

1. A member of the order called Templars, Knights Templars, Knights of the Temple, Soldiery of the Temple, Brethren of the Temple of Solomon at Jerusalem, and Soldiers of Christ. It was founded in 1118 or 1119 by nine Christian knights, of whom the chief were Hugues de Payens or de Paganès and Geoffroi de St. Omer or Ademar. These two leaders had only one horse between them, hence the seal of the order had two armed knights one behind another on the same horse. Their sole support was the alms of the faithful, and they were often called the Pauper soldiers. The original object of their association was to maintain free passage for the pilgrims visiting the Holy Land. Baldwin II., King of Jerusalem, accommodated them in part of his palace, while the abbot and canons of the church and convent of the Temple gave them a building wherein to keep their arms, whence they were called Templars. They soon rose to great power and wealth. In 1128 de Payens, with some of his followers, requested the Council of Troyes to frame a rule for the order. One was accordingly drawn up, and confirmed the same year by Pope Honorius II. In 1146 Eugenius III. enjoined them to wear a red cross on their left breast and on their banner. [BEAUSE-ANT.] Further privileges were conferred upon the order by Pope Alexander III. in 1162. The head of the Templars was called the Grand Master, and was elected by the chapter or general body of the knights; under him was a seneschal or lieutenant. Every country in which the order had possessions was called a Province, and was ruled by a grand prior, grand preceptor, or provincial master. Under these were priors, bailiffs, or masters, and subordinate to these, preceptors, each ruling over a preceptory—that is, a house, or two or more adjacent houses viewed as one establishment. Spiritual members called chaplains were also admitted, with serving brethren, some of whom bore arms as esquires to the knights, while others practiced handicrafts. There were, moreover, affiliated members, with children dedicated to the order by their parents, and grown-up persons pledged to its defense. During the period of the Crusades the valor of the knights was of great use to the Christian armies, and would have been still more so had there been proper coöperation between them and the Knights Hospitalers, who had been transformed into a second military order. When Jerusalem was taken by the Mohammedans in 1187, the Templars retired first to Antioch, then to Acre, then to the Pilgrims' Castle near Cæsarea, and finally to Lemisso (now Limasol) in Cyprus. In 1306 Philip the Fair, king of France, a determined enemy of the Church, lured Jacques de Molay, Master of the Temple, to Paris. On Sept. 13, 1307, he and all the Templars in France were simultaneously arrested. In December the English Templars who were settled at the spot in London still called the Temple, were also arrested. In August, 1308, Pope Clement V., who was in the power of the King of France, and under moral coercion, issued a bull calling upon all Christian princes and prelates to assist him in examining into the guilt of the order. To obtain evidence he issued a commission, which began on Aug. 7, 1309, and continued its investigation for about two years. The charges were gross immorality and impiety. After a General Council, held at Vienna in October, 1311, had been found uncompliant, Clement, on March 22, 1312, abolished the order, and on March 18, 1314, Molay, the Grand Master of the Templars, and Grey, Grand Prior of Normandy, were burnt to death. A mind possessing the judicial instinct looks with suspicion on charges brought first by two ex-Templars who had no friendly feeling to the order they had left. It cannot attach weight to evidence obtained solely by torture, and when it finds that the chief defendants were burnt alive to silence them, and died asserting their own innocence and that of their order, and that the King of France, the instigator of the proceedings, besides having a quarrel to avenge, had a heavy pecuniary interest in procuring an adverse verdict, as it would enable him to seize the Templars' wealth, amounting to some millions of pounds, it has little hesitation in declaring that the charges against the order were unproved, and that the treatment they received was a deep-dyed crime.

"So that the erle hadde no remedy but to withdrawe him assone as he might, into a place of the templers closed with stone walles."—Berners: Froissart; Cronycle, vol. iii., ch. cxlv.

2. Free Masonry: A member of the order of Knights Templars—a higher degree of Masonry.

3. An English student of the law; an English lawyer, so called from having chambers in the Temple, in London. [TEMPLE.]

4. A member of the order of Good Templars.

"He had often feared lest any of . . . their juvenile templars should be decoyed away on their journey to or from the meetings."—London Daily Chronicle.

flat, thin board, whose edge is dressed and shaped to the required conformation, and it is laid against the object being molded, built, or turned, so as to test the conformity of the object thereto.

"Template [is] an improper orthography for templet . . . a mold used in masonry for the cutting or setting out of the work."—Gwilt: Encyc. Architecture: Glossary.

tēm'-ple (1), s. [A.S. templ, tempel, from Low Lat. templum=a temple, originally a part cut off and set apart for religious purposes, from the same root as Gr. temnō=to cut; cf. Greek temenos=a sacred inclosure, Sp. & Port. templo; Ital. templo, tempio.]

I. Literally:

1. An edifice erected and dedicated to the service of some deity or deities, and connected with some pagan system of worship. The term is generally applied to such structures among the Greeks, Romans, Egyptians, and other ancient nations, as well as to structures serving the same purpose among modern heathen nations. Among all ancient nations the usual plan of a temple was rectangular, seldom circular. Among the Greeks rectangular temples were classed in forms, according to their architectural peculiarities, viz.:

(1) The temple in antis, in which the pteromata, or ends of the side walls, project so as to form plaster-like piers called antæ, between which are columns, generally two in number.

(2) The prostyle, in which the pronaos, or porch, is formed in its entire breadth by a disposition of columns, generally four in number, so that the corner columns stand in front of the antæ, with an intervening space.

(3) The amphiprostyle, in which both the front and back of the temple have the prostyle arrangement.

(4) The peristyle or peripteral, surrounded by columns on all sides, in which the front and back frequently have double rows of columns, and are both hexastyle.

(5) The pseudoperipteral, occurring extremely rarely in Grecian architecture, in which the peripteral is imitated by columns attached to the walls.

(6) The dipteral, surrounded by a double colonnade, with porticoes of from eight to ten columns in front.

(7) The pseudodipteral, which rarely occurs, is a dipteral with the inner range of columns omitted throughout.

The circular temples were of three kinds—

(1) The most usual was the peripteral, which had a circular cella, or cell, surrounded by a colonnade.

(2) The monopteral, which was an open circle of columns supporting a roof or entablature, and consequently without a cella.

(3) The pseudoperipteral, in which, as in the oblong pseudoperipteral, the columns were attached to the walls of the cella.

These circular temples, which are far from common, and in which Corinthian columns are usually employed, were, for the most part, intended for the worship of Vesta. A further distinction was made in temples according to the number of columns in front; this number, however, was always an even one. They are called tetrastyle, hexastyle, octastyle, decastyle, &c., according as they had four, six, eight, ten, &c., columns. Among the Etruscans the form of the temples differed from the Grecian, the ground-plan more nearly approaching a square, the sides being in the proportion of 5 to 6. The interior of these temples was divided into two parts, the front portion being an open portico resting on pillars, while the back part contained the sanctuary itself, and consisted of three cellæ placed alongside one another. The inter-columniation was considerably greater than in Grecian temples. Among the Romans a temple, in the restricted sense of an edifice set apart for the worship of the gods, consisted essentially of two parts only—a small apartment or sanctuary, the cella, sometimes only a niche for receiving the image of the god, and an altar standing in front of it, upon which were placed the offerings of the suppliant. The general form—whether circular, square, or oblong; whether covered with a roof, or open to the sky; whether plain and destitute of ornament, or graced by stately colonnades with elaborately sculptured friezes and pediments—depended entirely upon the taste of the architect and the liberality of the founders, but in no way increased or diminished the sanctity of the building. In so far as position was concerned, a temple, whenever circumstances permitted, was placed east and west, the opening immediately opposite to the cella being on the west side, so that those who stood before the altar with their eyes fixed upon the god, looked toward the east. The most celebrated temples of the ancients were those of Jupiter Olympus in Athens, of Diana (or Artemis) at Ephesus, of Apollo at Delphi, and of Vesta at Tivoli and Rome.

2. An edifice erected among Christians as a place of public worship; a church.

3. The name of two semi-monastic establishments of the middle ages—one in London, the other in Paris—inhabited by the Knights Templars. The Temple Church in London is the only portion of either now existing. On the side of the London establishment have been erected the two Inns of Courts known as the Inner and Middle Temples, which are occupied by barristers, and are the property of two societies called the Societies of the Inner and of the Middle Temple, who have the right of calling persons to the degree of barrister.

¶ The Jewish Temple:

Jewish Antiquities: The building reared by Solomon as a habitation for Jehovah, though the king was aware that God could not be confined to an earthly edifice, or even to the heaven of heavens (1 Kings viii. 27). David had planned the Temple, but was divinely forbidden to erect it, as he had shed so much blood in his wars (1 Chron. xxii. 8). He, however, made great preparations for his son and successor, who, he learned from the prophet Nathan (2 Sam. vii. 13), was destined to achieve the work. It was built on Mount Moriah (2 Chron. iii. 1), chiefly by Tyrian workmen, and had massive foundations. Its dimensions were 60 cubits (90 feet) long; 20 cubits (30 feet) wide, and 30 cubits (45 feet) high. The stone for its erection was dressed before its arrival, so that the edifice arose noiselessly (1 Kings vi. 7); the floor was of cedar, boarded over with planks of fir; the wainscoting was of cedar, covered with gold, as was the whole interior. It was modeled inside on the tabernacle, which was Jehovah's appropriate dwelling while journeyings were continually taking place, as the Temple was now that these had ceased. There was therefore a Holy and Most Holy Place. The Temple was surrounded by an inner court for the priest. There was also a Great or Outward Court (2 Chron. iv. 9; Ezek. xl. 17), called specially the Court of the Lord's House (Jer. xix. 14. xxvi. 2). This temple was destroyed by the Babylonians during siege of Jerusalem under Nebuchadnezzar (2 Kings xxv. 9; 2 Chron. xxxvi. 19). On the return from Babylon, a temple, far inferior to Solomon's, was commenced under Zerubbabel, B. C. 534, and, after a long intermission, was resumed B. C. 520, and completed B. C. 516, under Darius Hystaspes (Ezra iii. 7, vi. 15). The second temple was gradually removed by Herod, as he proceeded with the building or rebuilding of a temple designed to rival the first rather than the second. The work was commenced B. C. 21 or 20; the temple itself was finished in about a year and a half, the courts in eight years, but the subsequent operations were carried on so dilatorily that the Jews reckoned forty-six years as the whole time consumed (John ii. 20). In the courts of this temple Jesus preached and healed the sick. It caught fire during the siege of Jerusalem under Titus, and notwithstanding his efforts to save it was burned to the ground. (Josephus: Wars of the Jews.) temporal-lords, s. pl. The peers of a realm, as distinguished from the archbishops and bishops, or lords spiritual.

temporal-power, s.

Church History:

1. The power which the Pope exercised as sovereign of the States of the Church. [TIARA.] Pius VII. was partially deprived of his dominions by Napoleon I. in 1797, and entirely in 1808. The Pope replied by a bull of excommunication; he was then arrested and kept a close prisoner in France till the fall of Napoleon in 1814, when he was reinstated in the government of an undiminished territory. The temporal power was again attacked in 1848, when Pius IX. was driven from Rome, and a republic was established by Mazzini and Garibaldi. In 1849 General Oudinot was sent by Louis Napoleon, President of the French Republic, to Rome, and his army drove out the revolutionists and brought the Pope back. For ten years the Pope's power was not attacked, but Cavour (1809-1861) was working steadily for a "United Italy," and in 1870 Victor Emmanuel, King of Italy, took possession of the Papal territory, leaving the Pope only the Vatican. An annual dotation of 2,000,000 lire was guaranteed to him by the Italian parliament, but he has never accepted it. (The Syllabus, § ix. deals with "Errors concerning the Roman Pontiff's civil principedom.")

"The Popes have not ceased to declare, on all fitting occasions, that the preservation of their temporal independence is necessary, as human affairs are constituted, to the free and full exercise of their spiritual authority. It has been argued that the raison d'être of the temporal power has ceased in modern times, because the lay power has ceased to be, as it often was in the middle ages, arbitrary, corrupt, violent, and ill-informed, but on the contrary is administered on fixed and equitable principles which ensure equal justice for all."—Addis & Arnold: Cath. Dict., p. 774.

2. The power exercised by the Popes in the middle ages of excommunicating, and after excommunication deposing or procuring the deposition of a sovereign who had fallen into heresy. According to Addis & Arnold (Cath. Dict., p. 257), "The common opinion teaches that the Pope holds the power of both swords, the spiritual and the temporal, which jurisdiction and power Christ himself committed to Peter and his successors (Matt. xvi. 19). . . . The contrary opinion is held to savor of heresy." But tēm-pōr-ar-ī-lŷ, adv. [Eng. temporary; -ly.] In a temporary manner; for a time only; not perpetually.

"Those things may cause a temporaneous disunion."—Hallywell: Melampronæa, p. 68.

tēm-pōr-ar-ī-nēss, s. [Eng. temporary; -ness.] The quality or state of being temporary.

tēm-pōr-ar-ŷ, a. [Lat. temporarius, from tempus (genit. temporis)=time; Fr. temporaire; Sp. & Ital. temporario.] Lasting for a time only; having limited duration or existence; made for a time or for a special occasion or purpose; not perpetual, not permanent.

"What he recommended was, not a standing, but a temporary army, an army of which Parliament would annually fix the number."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xxiii.

¶ Temporary characterizes that which is intended to last only for a time, in distinction from that which is permanent; offices depending upon a state of war are temporary, in distinction from those which are connected with internal policy; transitory, that is, apt to pass away, characterizes everything in the world which is formed only to exist for a time, and then to pass away; thus our pleasures, and our pains, and our very being, are denominated transitory; fleeting, which is derived from the verb to fly and flight, is but a stronger term to express the same idea as transitory. (Crabb.) temporary-star, s.

Astron.: A star appearing for a time, and then gradually vanishing away. In November, 1572, a star burst out in Cassiopeia with a brilliancy greater than that of any one near it, Tycho Brahe being one of those who observed it at the time. It rapidly increased in magnitude till it outshone Sirius and Jupiter, and became visible even at noon. Then it diminished in size, and in March, 1574, became invisible to the naked eye, nor has it been seen since. During its brief life it shone first white, then yellow, then reddish, and finally bluish. La Place thought the reason of its temporary visibility was the bursting out within it of fire. On the evening of February 21, 1901, a new star suddenly appeared in the constellation Perseus, of a bluish white light and a little brighter than a third magnitude star. It continued to increase in brightness until February 23, when it was one-fourth brighter than any other star in the northern hemisphere. On February 24 it began to decline in brilliancy and to change to an orange color, and on April 1 it had dwindled to a star of the fifth magnitude, being a hundred times fainter than at its maximum. [VARIABLE STAR.]

tēm-pōr-īst, s. [Lat. tempus (genit. temporis)=time.] A temporizer. (Marston.) tēm-pōr-ī-zā'-tion, subst. [Eng. temporiz(e); -ation.] The act or habit of temporizing.

"Charges of temporization and compliance had somewhat sullied his reputation."—Johnson: Life of Ascham.

tēm-pōr-ize, *tēm-pōr-ize, v. i. [Fr. temporiser, from Lat. tempus (genit. temporis)=time.]

1. To comply with the time or occasion; to humor or yield to the current of opinion or to circumstances; to suit one's actions or conduct to the time or circumstances.

2. To try to suit both sides or parties; to trim.

*3. To delay; to procrastinate.

"The Earl of Lincoln, deceived of the country's course, in which case he would have temporized, resolved to give the king battle."—Bacon: Henry VII.

"Day at length came, and the temptress vanished."—Scott: Glenfinlas. (Note.)

tēmse, tēmpse, s. [A. S. temes; Dut. tems=a colander, a sieve.] A colander, a sieve.

¶ To set the temse (or Thames) on fire: To make a figure in the world. The origin of the expression is uncertain. According to Brewer, a hard-working, active man would not unfrequently ply the temse so quickly as to set fire to the wooden hoop at the bottom; but a lazy fellow would never set the temse on fire. He adds that the play on the word temse has given rise to many imitations; as, He will never set the Seine on fire (the French Seine also=a drag-net). Other authorities contend for the literal view. The suggestion that temse should be read for Thames appeared in Notes & Queries (3d ser., vii. 239); and, in answer to a correspondent (6th ser., xii. 360), the editor says: "This idea, which is discussed 4th ser., vi. 32, 101, 144, 223; xii. 80, 119, 137, like other suggestions of the kind, is received with little favor, and the ordinarily accepted supposition is that it is equivalent to saying that an idle fellow will not at any time accomplish a miracle." Another version is that the expression arose from the idea that an impetuous flail man would work so industriously as to set the haulmes (vulg. hames) of grain afire by concussion with the flail. Hence, He will (or will not) set t'hames (the haulmes) afire. This latter seems the more probable explanation. [HAMES.]

temse-bread, temsed-bread, *temse-loaf, s. Bread made of flour better sifted than common flour.

"Some mixeth to miller the rye with the wheat

Tems-loaf, on his table, to have for to eat."

Ten Tribes, s. pl.

Hist.: The kingdom of Israel as distinguished from the kingdom of Judah (1 Kings xi. 29-35, xii. 15-24). The former consisted of all the tribes except Judah and Benjamin, and these ten tribes were carried into captivity by Shalmaneser, king of Assyria (2 Kings xviii. 8-10), and from this captivity it is generally believed that there was no return. This dispersion naturally gave rise to many theories, one of the latest of which is Anglo-Israelism, which endeavors to prove the identity of the English nation with the lost Ten Tribes, and thereby to claim for England the Biblical promises of favor of Israel. The theory was first broached by the late John Wilson of Brighton, about 1840, in a series of lectures since published under the title of Our Israelitish Origin. The Anglo-Israelites claim that they form a body of two millions distributed over the English speaking portions of the world, and they have a considerable literature.

těn'-a-ble, [tē'-nā-ble, a. [Fr. from tenir (Lat. teneo)=to hold.]

1. Capable of being held, retained, or maintained against assault.

"Still the church is tenable, Whence issued late the fated ball."

Byron: Siege of Corinth, 28.

- *2. Capable of being kept back or not uttered. (Shakesp.: Hamlet, i. 2.)

3. Capable of being held, maintained, or defended against argument or objections.

"They therefore took ground lower and more tenable."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xi.

těn'-a-ble-něss, [tē'-nā-ble-něss, subst. [Eng. tenable; -ness.] The quality or state of being tenable; tenability.

těn'-āce, s. [Fr.]

Whist: The holding by the last player of the best and third-best of the suit led, so that he wins the last two tricks. Tenace minor is the holding of the best and fourth-best cards.

tě-nā'-cious, a. [As if from a Lat. tenaciosus, from tenax (genit. tenacis)=holding, tenacious; teneo=to hold; Fr. tenace.]

1. Holding fast; grasping hard; inclined to hold fast; not willing to let go what is in one's possession. (Followed by of before the thing held.)

"Free of his money and tenacious of a secret."—Bishop Taylor: Discourse of Friendship.

2. Retentive; retaining long what is committed to it.

"The memory in some is very tenacious, but yet there seems to be a constant decay of all our ideas, even of those which are struck deepest, and in minds the most retentive."—Locke.

- *3 Niggardly, close-fisted, miserly.

4. Apt to adhere to another substance; adhesive, viscous. (Cowper: Task, i. 215.)

5. Having points disposed to adhere to each other; having great cohesive force among its particles; tough; having the quality of resisting tension or tearing asunder.

tě-nā'-cious-lŷ, adv. [Eng. tenacious; -ly.]

1. In a tenacious manner; with a disposition to hold fast what is possessed by or committed to it.

2. Adhesively; with cohesive force.

tě-nā'-cious-něss, s. [English tenacious; -ness.]

1. The quality or state of being tenacious of that which is possessed or committed; unwillingness to let go, resign, or quit.

"Tenaciousness even of a resolution taken for opposition sake serves either to good or bad purposes."—Search: Light of Nature, vol. i., pt. i., ch. vi.

2. That quality of bodies which enables them to adhere or stick to others; adhesiveness, tenacity.

3. That quality of bodies which enables them to resist tension or tearing asunder; tenacity; cohesive force.

tě-nāč'-i-tŷ, te-nac-i-tie, s. [French tenacité, from Lat. tenacitatem, accus. of tenacitas, from tenax (genit. tenacis)=tenacious (q. v.).]

1. Literally:

1. The quality or state of being tenacious; that quality of bodies which makes them adhere to other substances; adhesiveness, stickiness, glutinousness.

"The slime engendered within the lake of Sodome in Jurie, as viscous as it is otherwise, will forego all that tenacitie."—P. Holland: Pliny, bk. xxviii., ch. vii.

2. That property of material bodies by which they are able to resist a severe strain without rupturing or splitting; that quality of material bodies by which their parts resist an effort to force or pull them asunder; the measure of the resistance of bodies to tearing or crushing; opposed to brittleness or fragility. Tenacity results from the attraction of cohesion existing between the particles of bodies, and is directly proportional to it. It consequently varies in different substances, and even in the same material under varying conditions as regards temperature. The resistance offered to tearing is called absolute tenacity, that offered to crushing, retroactive tenacity. The processes of forging and wire-drawing increase the tenacity of metals longitudinally, and the tenacity of mixed metals is generally greater than that of simple metals. The tenacity of wood is greater in its longitudinal direction than in a transverse direction.

¶ The method of ascertaining the tenacity of particular bodies is to form them into cylindrical or prismatic wires, and note the weight required to break them. It is directly proportional to the breaking weight, and inversely proportional to the area of a transverse section of the wire.

3. The quality of holding on to, or of not letting go the hold on anything.

"The tenacity of the English bull-dog . . . was a subject for national boasting."—Lecky: England in the Eighteenth Century, vol. i., ch. iv.

*II. Fig.: Unwillingness to forget; obstinacy.

"I find, to my grief, that the mis-understanding tenacitie of some zealous spirits hath made it a quarrell."—Bp. Hall: The Reconciler.

těn-āc'-u-lŷm, s. [Lat.=a holder, from teneo=to hold.]

Surg.: A fine hook, attached to a handle, which is thrust through a blood vessel, to draw it out and enable it to be tied.

tenaculum-forceps, s.

Surg.: An instrument for grasping an artery, to facilitate tying. The instrument has a pair of bifurcated claws, which close into each other upon the artery by a spring.

těn'-a-čŷ, s. [Low Latin tenacia, from Latin tenax (genit. tenacis)=tenacity (q. v.).] Tenacity, tenaciousness.

"Highest excellence is void of all envy, selfishness, and tenacy."—Barrow: Sermons, vol. ii., ser. xii.

tě-nāil', tě-nāille', s. [Fr. tenaille, from tenir (Lat. teneo)=to hold.]

Fort.: A low work located in the ditch and in front of a curtain to protect the curtain and flanks of the bastions. A passage for troops is left between each end and the adjacent flank.

tě-nāil'-lŷn (second l as y), s. [French, from tenaille=tenail (q. v.).]

Fort.: A low outwork having a salient angle; it was formerly usual to place one on each side of a ravelin to increase its strength and cover the shoulders of the bastion.

těn'-an-čŷ, ten-an-cie, s. [Eng. tenant(t); -cy.]

1. A holding or possession of lands or tenements from year to year, or for a term of years, for a life or lives, or at will; tenure; the temporary possession of what belongs to another.

"To this species of tenancy succeeded, though by very slow degrees, farmers, properly so called, who cultivated the land with their own stock, paying a rent certain to the landlord."—Smith: Wealth of Nations, bk. iii., ch. ii.

2. The period during which lands or tenements are held by one person from another.

- *3. A house of habitation, or a place to live in, held of another.

¶ Tenancy in Common:

Law: The kind of tenure possessed by tenants in common. [TENANT (1), s., II. (8).]

těn'-ant (1), ten-aunt, a. & s. [Fr. tenant, par. of tenir=to hold.] [TENABLE.]

A. As adjective:

Her.: The same as HOLDING (q. v.).

B. As substantive:

- I. Ord. Lang.: One who has possession of or occupies any place; a dweller, an occupant.

"Sweet tenants of this grove,
Who sing without design."

Cowper: Joy in Martyrdom.

II. Law:

1. A person who holds or possesses lands or tenements by any kind of title, either in fee, for life, for years, or at will. In ordinary language one who holds lands or houses under another, to whom he is bound to pay rent, and who is called in relation to him his landlord.

"Estates for life, created by deed or grant, are where a lease is made of lands or tenements to a man, to hold for the term of his own life, or for that of any other person, or for more lives than one; in any of which cases he is styled tenant for life; only when he holds the estate by the life of another, he is usually called tenant pur autre vie."—Blackstone: Comment., bk. ii., ch. 10.

2. A defendant in a real action. [REAL (1), A. II.]

¶ (1) Sole tenant: One who holds in his own sole right, and not with another.

(2) Tenant at sufferance: One who having been in lawful possession of land, keeps it after the title has come to an end by the sufferance of the rightful owner.

(3) Tenant at will: One in possession of lands, &c., let to him at the will of the lessor.

(4) Tenant by copy of court-roll: One who is admitted tenant of any lands, &c., within a manor.

(7) Tenant in capite, Tenant in chief: [CAPITE, CHIEF, B. II. 1.]

(8) Tenant in common: One who holds or occupies lands or possesses chattels in common with another or others. In such a case each has an equal interest; but in the event of the death of either his share does not go to the survivors, as in the case of a joint tenancy, but to his heirs or executors.

"As to the incidents attending a tenancy in common; tenants in common, like joint-tenants, are compellable by bill in equity to make partition of their lands; yet there is no survivorship between them, as properly they take distinct moieties of the estate."—Blackstone: Comment., bk. ii., ch. 10.

(9) Tenant in dower: A widow who possesses lands, &c., in virtue of her dower.

(10) Tenant in fee simple: [FEE, s.]

(11) Tenant in fee tail: [TAIL (2), s.]

tenant-right, s.

Law and Custom: A custom insuring to a tenant a permanence of tenure without any increase of rent, unless one sanctioned by the general sentiments of the community, or entitling him to purchase money amounting to so many years' rent in case of his holding being transferred to another. It prevails in Ulster, and was introduced in a modified form into the Irish Land Act of July 8, 1870. (Wharton.)

těnčh, s. [O. Fr. tenche; Fr. tanche; Lat. tinca (q. v.).]

Ichthy.: Tinca tinca (or † vulgaris), the sole species of the genus, found all over Europe in stagnant waters with soft bottom. Like most other Carps of the group Leuciscina, it passes the winter in a torpid state, concealed in the mud. Tench have been taken three feet long, but one of half that size is unusually large. They breed in May and June, depositing the spawn among aquatic plants; the ova are small, and exceedingly numerous, as many as 297,000 having been counted in a single female. The flesh is naturally soft and insipid, but if the fish are fed on meal, its becomes delicate and well-flavored. The color is usually deep yellowish-brown, and the so-called Golden Tench is not a distinct species, but a variety displaying incipient albinism.

tench-weed, s.

Bot.: The genus Potamogeton (q. v.), spec. P. natans. Forby supposes the name is given because the weed is very agreeable to the fish, but Prior because it grows in ponds "where tench have broken up the pudding by burrowing in it."

"Whether ill tendment or recurelesse paine Procure his death, the neighbors all complaine."
Bp. Hall: Satires, ii. 4.

tēn'-dō, s. [TENDON.] A tendon.

tendo-Achillis, s. [ACHILLIS-TENDO.]

tēn'-dōn, s. [Fr., from an imaginary Low Latin tendo, from Lat. tendo=to stretch.]

Anatomy (pl.): Cords of tough, white, shining fibrous tissue, connecting the ligaments with the bones.

tendon-phenomena, s. pl.

Physiology: The action of certain muscles, due apparently to reflex action produced by afferent impulses started in the tendon, but really to direct stimulation of the muscles themselves. Thus, when the leg is placed in an easy position (for example, resting upon the other leg), a sharp blow on the patellar tendon will cause a sudden jerk forward of the leg, produced by the contraction of the quadriceps femoris muscle.

tēn'-dō-tōme, s. [Eng. tendo(n), and Gr. tomē=a cutting.]

Surgery: A subcutaneous knife, having a small oblong blade on the end of a long stem, and used for severing deep-seated tendons without making a large incision or dissecting down to the spot.

tēn'-drāc, s. [Native name.]

Zoöl.: A small insectivorous mammal, from Madagascar, allied to the Tanrec, but separated on account of its dentition, and given generic rank under the name Ericulus. It is about two-thirds of the size of the Common Hedgehog, which it closely resembles in appearance. Its general tint is dusky, the spines being black, tipped with white or light red. Telfair's Tendirac, with the same habitat, constitutes another genus, Echinops, differing from Ericulus in dentition. It is about five inches long, brownish above, dingy white beneath, the upper surface closely covered with sharp spines. [RICE-TENDRAC.]

Tendirac.

tēn'-drīl, *tēn'-drēll, s. & a. [Shortened from Fr. tendrillons=tendrils; O. F. tendron=a tender fellow, a tendril, from tendre=tender (q. v.); cf. Ital. tenerume=cartilages, tendrils, from tenero=tender.]

A. As substantive:

1. Bot. & Lit.: A curling and twining thread-like process by which one plant clings to another body for the purpose of support. It may be a modification of the midrib, as in the pea; a prolongation of a leaf, as in Nepenthes; or a modification of the inflorescence, as in the vine. They have been divided into stem-tendrils and leaf-tendrils. Called also Cirrus, and by the old authors Capreolus and Clavicula. Linnæus included tendrils under his fulcra. Tendril-bearing plants are distributed among ten orders.

"As the vine curls her tendrils."—Milton: P. L., iv. 307.

¶ Darwin (Origin of Species, ch. vii.) points out that the gradations from leaf-climbers to tendril-bearers are wonderfully close, and that in each case the change is beneficial to the species in a high degree.

2. Fig.: Anything curling or spiral like a tendril.

"The glossy tendrils of his raven hair."

Byron: Lara, ii. 21.

B. As adj.: Clinging or climbing like a tendril; having tendrils.

"Mingled with the curling growth Of tendrils hops, that flaunt upon their poles."

Dyer: Fleecce, i.

tēn'-drīled, tēn'-drilled, adj. [English tendrils; -ed.]

Bot., &c.: Furnished with tendrils.

"Round their trunks the thousand-tendriled vine wound up."
Southey: Thalaba, bk. vi.

tēn'-drōn, *s. [O. Fr.] A tendril.

"Buds and tendrons appear above ground."—P. Holland: Pliny, bk. xix., ch. viii.

tēn'-drý, *s. [Eng. tender (1), v.; -y.] Tender, offer.

tēnd'-sōme, a. [Eng. tend (1), v.; -some.] Needing much care and attention; as, a tendsome child. (Prov.) tēne, *s. & v. [TEEN.]

tēn'-ē-bræ, s. pl. [Lat.=darkness.]

Eccles.: The office of Matins and Lauds for the Thursday, Friday, and Saturday in Holy Week (q. v.), sung on the afternoon or evening of Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday respectively. The Gloria Patri, hymns, antiphons of the Blessed Virgin, &c., are omitted in token of sorrow. At the beginning of the office, fifteen lighted candles are placed on a triangular stand, and at the conclusion of each psalm one is put out, till a single candle is left at the top of the triangle. While the Benedictus is being sung, the lights on the high altar are extinguished, and then the single candle is hidden at the Epistle side, to be brought out at the conclusion of the office. The extinction of the lights (whence the name tenebræ) is said to figure the growing darkness of the world at the time of the Crucifixion, and the last candle is hidden for a time to signify that death could not really obtain dominion over Christ, though it appeared to do so. A noise is made at the conclusion of the office to symbolize the convulsions of nature at the death of Christ (Matt. xxvii. 45, 50-53; Mark xv. 33, 37, 38; Luke xxiii. 44, 45).

tō-nē'-brī-cōse, *adj. [Lat. tenebricosus, from tenebræ=darkness.] Tenebrous, dark, gloomy.

tēn'-ē-brīf'-ic, a. [Lat. tenebræ=darkness, and facio=to make.] Causing or producing darkness; darkening.

"Where light Lay fitful in a tenebrific time."

Browning: Ring and Book, x. 1,761.

tēn'-ē-brīf'-ic-ōūs, a. [TENEBRIFIC.] Causing or producing darkness; tenebrific.

tē-nē'-brī-ō, s. [Lat.=one who shuns the light, from tenebræ=darkness.]

Entom.: The typical genus of Tenebrionidæ (q. v.). Tenebrio molitor is the Mealworm (q. v.).

tē-nē-brī-ōn'-i-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. tenebrio, genit. tenebrion(is); fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Entom.: A family of Heteromorous Beetles, tribe Atrachelia. Body usually oval or oblong, depressed; thorax square or trapezoid, the same breadth as the extremity of the abdomen; last joint of the maxillary palpi formed like a reversed triangle or hatchet; mentum but little extended, leaving the base of the jaws uncovered. Black or dull-colored insects, with a peculiar odor, slow in their movements and nocturnal in their habits. A few aberrant species are found on trees and plants. They feed generally on decaying animal and vegetable matter. Most of the hard species are very tenacious of life. Some are mimetic, resembling Carabidæ, Longicornes, &c. About 5,000 species are known. The larger number are found along the margins of deserts in the Old and New World. Genera: Blaps, Tenebrio, &c.

tē-nē'-brī-ōūs, a. [Latin tenebræ=darkness.] Dark, gloomy, tenebrous; pertaining to night.

"Were moon and stars for villains only made,
 To guide, yet screen them, with tenebrious light?"

Young: Night Thoughts, ix. 965.

tēn'-ē-brōse, adj. [Latin tenebrosus.] Dark, tenebrous.

Tēn'-ē-brō-sī, s. pl. [Ital.] [TENE BROSE.]

Art: A name applied to a school of artists, also called Caravaggeschi, after its founder, Caravaggio. The remarkable characteristic of this class of artists was their bold and powerful rendering of chiaroscuro.

tēn'-ē-brōs'-i-tý, s. [O. Fr. ténébrosité.] The quality or state of being tenebrous; darkness, gloom, gloominess.

"Tenebrosity or darkness is directly opposite to light and clearness."—P. Holland: Plutarch, p. 382.

tēn'-ē-brōūs, a. [Lat. tenebrosus, from tenebræ=darkness.] Dark, gloomy.

"The towering and tenebrous boughs of the cypress."

Longfellow: Evangeline, ii. 2.

tēn'-ē-brōūs-nēss, s. [Eng. tenebrous; -ness.] The quality or state of being tenebrous; darkness, gloom.

tēn'-ē-mēnt, s. [Fr., from Low Lat. tenementum, from Lat. teneo=to hold.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. An abode, a habitation, a dwelling, a house. (Lit. & fig.)

"Can all saint, sage, or sophist ever writ, People this lonely tower, this tenement refit?"

Byron: Child Harold, ii. 6.

2. An apartment, or set of apartments, in a building, used by one family; an apartment, or set of apartments, in an inferior building used by a poor family.

II. Law: Any species of permanent property that may be held, as lands, houses, an advowson, a franchise, a peerage, &c.

"Tenement is a word of still greater extent (than land) and though in its vulgar acceptance it is only applied to houses and other buildings, yet in its original, proper,

bōil, bōy; pōut, jōwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, aş; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f. -cian, -tian = şan. -tion, -sion = şūn; tion -şion = şūn -tious, -cious, -sious = şūş. -ble, -dle, &c. = bəl, dəl.

and legal sense, it signifies everything that may be holden, provided it be of a permanent nature, whether it be of a substantial and sensible, or of an unsubstantial ideal kind."—Blackstone: Comment., bk. ii., ch. 2.

tenement-house, s. A house divided into tenements occupied by separate families. In tenement houses the landlord does not reside on the premises. [TENEMENT, I. 2.]

¶ In most large cities of this country, owing to the exorbitantly high price of land whereon to build, the policy has obtained of building houses containing apartments to accommodate (or contain) as many persons as can be crowded into them. These apartments are let by the landlord either in suites or by the single room, and here are massed together, usually surrounded by squalor and filth, many individuals of the poorer classes. Owing to their crowded condition these houses present problems of sanitation impossible of solution, and are breeding places of disease and nurseries of plagues in times of epidemics. In some cities tenement houses are under police surveillance, but their existence presents one of the hardest questions of modern civilization.

těn-ě-měnt'-al, a. [Eng. tenement; -al.] Pertaining to a tenement, or tenements; capable of being held by a tenant.

"The other, or tenemental lands, they distributed among their tenants."—Blackstone: Comment., bk. iii., ch. 2.

těn-ě-měnt'-ar-ý, adj. [Eng. tenement; -ary.] Capable of being leased; designed for tenancy; held by tenants.

"Such were the Ceorls among the Saxons; but of two sorts, one that hired the lord's outland or tenementary land (called also the Folcland) like our farmers."—Spelman: Of Feuds and Tenures, ch. vii.

tě-něn'-dās, s. [Lat., accus. fem. pl. of tenendus, fut. pass. par. of teneo=to hold.]

Scots Law: That clause of a charter by which the particular tenure is expressed.

tě-něn'-dūm, s. [Lat., neut. sing. of tenendus, fut. pass. par. of teneo=to hold.]

Law: That clause in a deed wherein the tenure of the land is created and limited. Its office is to limit and appoint the tenure of the land which is held, and how and of whom it is to be held.

těn'-ěnt, s. [Lat., 3d pers. pl. pr. indic. of teneo=to hold.] A tenet (q. v.).

"His tenet is always as singular and aloof from the vulgar as he can."—Earle: Microcosmography.

těn-ēr-iffē, s. [See def.] A wine brought from Teneriffe, one of the Canary Islands, resembling Madeira, but a little more acid in taste.

tě-něr'-i-tý, s. [Lat. teneritas, from tener=tender (q. v.).] Tenderness.

tě-něš'-míc, a. [TENESMUS.]

Med.: Pertaining to, or characterized by tenesmus.

tě-něš'-mūs, s. [Latin, from Gr. teinesmos (see def.); teinō=to strain.]

Pathol.: A desire to go to stool without the power of evacuation; a straining at stool. It generally arises from violent and irregular motion of the rectum, as when there are in it ulcers, excrescences, &c., or when there is stone in the bladder, or after long-continued diarrhoea, or in dysentery, &c.

těn'-ět, s. [Latin=he holds, 3d pers. sing. pr. indic. of teneo=to hold.] Any opinion, principle, doctrine, or dogma which a person holds, believes, or maintains as true.

"So that men will disbelieve their own eyes, renounce the evidence of their senses, and give their own experience the lie rather than admit of anything disagreeing with these sacred tenets."—Locke: Human Underst., bk. iv., ch. xx.

těn'-föld, a. or adv. [Eng. ten, and fold.] Ten times as many or as great; ten times greater or more.

těhg'-ēr-ite, s. [After C. Tenger, one of the first who described it; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A pulverulent mineral occurring as a thin crust on the gadolinite of Ytterby, Sweden. Luster, dull; color, white. Composition stated to be that of a carbonate of yttria.

Těhg'-malm, s. [Peter Gustavus Tengmalm, a Swedish naturalist, contemporary with Linnæus, and author of Pan Suecus.]

Tengmalm's owl, s.

Ornith.: Nyctala tengmalmi, the Common Passenger or Tengmalm's Owl, is deep brown, with a white throat, round brown spots on the breast and wings, and four white lines on the tail. It is scarcely larger than a blackbird.

tě-ni-ōid, a. [TĒNIŌID.]

těn'-nant-ite, subst. [After the English chemist Smithson-Tennant; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: An isometric mineral, occurring mostly in crystals. Hardness, 3.5-4; specific gravity 4.37-4.53;

luster, metallic, becoming very dull on long exposure to light; color, blackish-gray to iron-black; streak, dark-gray. Composition: A sulpharsenite of copper and iron, with the formula 4(Cu,Fe)S+As₂S₃. The finest crystals have been hitherto found in the mines of Cornwall.

těn'-nē, s. [Fr. tanné.] [TAWNY.]

Her.: A color, a kind of chestnut or orange-brown color. It is seldom used in coat-armor. In engraving it is represented by diagonal lines, drawn from the sinister chief point, and traversed by horizontal ones.

těn'-nēr, s. [Eng. ten; -er.] A ten-dollar note. (Slang.)

Těn-nes-seē, s. [Am. Indian=River with the Big Bend. Named from Tennessee river.] One of the States of the U. S. A. Bounded W. by Missouri and Arkansas, from which it is separated by the Mississippi river, N. by Kentucky and Virginia, E. by North Carolina, from which it is separated by the Alleghany mountains, and S. by Mississippi, Alabama and Georgia. Area, 42,050 square miles. Originally Tennessee formed a part of the possessions of North Carolina, which State ceded it to the general government in 1784, but afterwards revoked the grant, when the inhabitants attempted to form an independent State under the name of Franklinia. It was afterwards ceded to the U. S. government and formed a part of the Southwestern Territory till its admission as a State, June 1, 1796. Principal agricultural products, corn, oats, tobacco, cotton, hay and peanuts. The principal minerals are coal, iron, copper, zinc, lead and manganese. Iron manufactures are important. The first steel produced in the South was made at Chattanooga. It has good educational facilities. Principal cities, Nashville, the capital and metropolis; Memphis, Chattanooga, and Knoxville.

těn'-nīs, ten-eis, ten-nes, ten-nys, ten-ys, ten-yse, s. [Etym. doubtful. Skeat proposes O. Fr. tenies, pl. of tenie=a fillet, headband (Lat. tenia), in allusion to the string over which the balls are played, or to the streak on the wall as in rackets. Others prefer Fr. tenez=take this, 2nd pers. pl. imperative of tenir=to hold.] A game of ball played in a court by two or four persons. The court is divided by a net, about three feet high, called the "line," and the game consists in driving a ball against the wall, and causing it to rebound beyond the line, by striking it with a small bat, known as a racket, the object being to keep the ball in motion as long as possible, he who first allows it to fall to the ground losing the stroke.

"His easy bow, his good stories, his style of dancing and playing tennis, the sound of his cordial laugh, were familiar to all London."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xi.

tennis-ball, subst. The ball used in the game of tennis. (Shakesp.: Much Ado, iii. 2.)

tennis-court, s. A court or alley in which tennis is played. (Shakesp.: Henry IV., Pt. II., ii. 2.)

těn'-nīs, v. t. [TENNIS, s.] To drive backward and forward, as a ball in the game of tennis.

"Those four garrisons issuing forth upon the enemy, will so drive him from one side to another, and tennis him amongst them, that he shall find no where safe to keep his feet in, nor hide himself."—Spenser: On Ireland.

těn'-ōn, ten-oun, ten-non, ten-own, ten-ant, ten-ent, subst. [Fr. tenon, from tenir; Lat. teneo=to hold.]

Carp.: The projecting end of a piece of timber fitted for insertion into a mortise, formed by cutting away a portion on one or more sides; sometimes made cylindrical. The usual joint in putting up wooden frames, whether of buildings or machines. Tenons are secured in their mortises by pins, or by giving them a dovetail, which is driven into the undercut mortise by means of a wedge or backing-block.

"A mortice and tenon, or ball-and-socket joint, is wanted at the hip."—Pat yot: Nat. Theol., ch. viii.

tenon-auger, s. A hollow auger used for turning the ends of movable blind-slats down to a round tenon. The end of the tenon is afterward dressed by a bur.

tenon-saw, s. A thin saw with a thicker metallic backing; used for fine work, such as sawing tenons, dovetails, miters for joints, &c.

těn'-ōn, v. t. [TENON, s.]

I. Literally:

1. To fit for insertion into a mortise, as the end of a piece of timber.

2. To join by means of a tenon.

II. Fig.: To fasten or join together as with a tenon. (Andrewes: Sermons, ii. 86.)

těn'-ōn-ing, pr. par. or a. [TENON, v.]

tenoning-chisel, s. A double-blade chisel which makes two cuts, leaving a middle piece which forms a tenon.

tenoning-machine, s. A machine for cutting timber to leave a tenon.

těn'-ōr, těn'-ōur, ten-oure, s. & a. [French teneur=the tenor part in music, tenor, substance, from Lat. tenorem, accus. of tenor=a holding on, tenor, sense; teneo=to hold; Sp. tenor; Ital. tenore.]

A. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Continued run or course; general or prevailing direction; mode of continuance.

"So shall my days in one sad tenor run."

Pope: Homer's Iliad, vi. 520.

2. The course or line of thought which runs or holds through the whole of a discourse; general course, direction, or drift of thought; general spirit, meaning, or tendency; purport, substance.

"The whole tenor of the gospels and epistles shows, that human virtues are all light in the balance."—Waterland: Works, v. 473.

*3. Stamp, character, nature, kind.

"All of a tenor was their after-life."

Dryden: Palamon and Arcite, iii. 1, 148.

II. Technically:

1. Law: A transcript or copy. It implies that a correct copy is set out, and therefore the instrument must be set out correctly, even although the pleader may not have set out more than the substance or purport of the instrument.

2. Music:

(1) The third of the four kinds of voices arranged with regard to their compass. It is the highest of the male chest voices, and its extent lies between tenor C and treble A. The tenor voice is sometimes called by way of distinction "the human voice," from an idea that it is the quality and compass of voice most common to man. The Plain Song of the Church was formerly given as a tenor part, the harmonies being constructed above and below it. The name is derived from the holding or sustaining note which was given formerly to this voice. In old music the tenor voice was divided into three classes, high, mean, and low tenor.

(2) The third of the four parts in which concerted or harmonized music for mixed voices is usually composed; the part above the bass. Formerly the music for this part was written on a staff marked with the tenor clef; but now it is generally written in displayed or full-score music on the staff marked with the treble clef, and is sung an octave lower. In compressed and short-score music it is written on the bass staff and its supplementary upper ledger-lines.

(3) One who possesses a tenor voice; one who sings a tenor part.

(4) An instrument which plays a tenor part.

(5) The larger violin of low pitch is called the tenor, alto viola, bratsche, and sometimes alto violin.

(6) A tenor bell (q. v.).

B. As adjective:

Music: Pertaining to the tenor; adapted for playing or singing the tenor part; as, a tenor voice, a tenor instrument.

tenor bell, s. The principal bell in a peal or set. tenor C, s.

Music:

1. The lowest C in the tenor voice.

2. The lowest string of the tenor violin.

tenor-clef, s.

Music: The C clef placed upon the fourth line of the stave. It is used for the tenor voice, tenor trombone, the higher register of the bassoon and violoncello, &c. The treble clef is sometimes employed for the tenor voice, but the notes are then expressed an octave above their true sound.

tenor-trombone, s.

Music: A trombone with a compass of two octaves and a fifth.

těn'-ōr, s. [A corruption of tenon (q. v.).]

těn'-ōr'-ē, s. [Ital.]

Music:

1. A tenor voice.

2. A tenor singer.

¶ Tenore buffo, a tenor singer to whom is assigned a comic part in an opera; Tenore leggiero, a tenor singer with a voice of light, small quality; Tenore robusto, a tenor singer with a full, strong, sonorous voice.

těn'-ō-rī-nō, s. [Ital., dimin. of tenore=tenor.] A tenor singer having a voice of a light, clear, thin quality.

těn'-ōr-ist, s. [Eng. tenor; -ist.]

Music: One who sings the tenor part or plays the tenor violin. (Stainer & Barrett.)

Tenon.

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāl, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camel, hēr, thēre; pīne, pīt, sīre, sīr, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rūle, fūll; trȳ, Sȳrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

těn'-ōr-īte, subst. [After the Neapolitan savant, Tenore; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A variety of melaconite (q.v.), occurring in very thin crystalline scales of a shining black color on volcanic scoria at Vesuvius. Lately shown, on optical grounds, to be triclinic in crystallization.

těn'-ōr-oōn', s. [TENOR.]

Music:

1. The name of an old tenor oboe with a compass extending downward to tenor c.

2. A word affixed to an organ stop to denote that it does not proceed below tenor c; as, tenoroon hautboy. A tenoroon diapason is a double diapason which does not extend below tenor c.

těn'-ō-tōme, s. [TENDOTOME.]

těn'-ōt'-ō-mỹ, těn'-ōn-tōt'-ō-mỹ, s. [Gr. tenōn, (genit. tenontos)=a tenon, and tomē=a cutting.]

Surg.: The act of dividing a tendon; the division of a tendon.

těn'-pēn-nỹ, a. [Eng. ten, and penny.] Valued at or worth tenpence.

tenpenny-nail, s. [PENNY, ¶.]

těn'-rēc, s. [TANREC.]

tēnse, adj. [Lat. tensus, pa. par. of tendo=to stretch.] Stretched tightly; stretched or strained to stiffness; rigid; not lax.

"The skin was tense, also rimped and blistered."—Wiseman: Surgery.

tēnse, tence, s. [O. Fr. tens; Fr. temps=time, season, from Lat. tenpus=time, a tense; Port. & Ital. tempo; Sp. tiempo.]

Gram.: One of the forms which a verb takes in order to express time of action or of that which is affirmed; one of the particular forms of inflection of a verb by which time of action is expressed. The primary simple tenses are three: past, present, and future; but these admit of many modifications, which differ in different languages. In English tenses are formed: (1) by internal vowel change, as in sing, sang, fling, flung, &c.; (2) by terminational inflection, as in love, loved, live, lived, &c.; or (3) by the use of auxiliary verbs, as love, did love, will love; go, will go, had gone, &c.

"The tenses are used to mark present, past, and future time, either indefinitely without reference to any beginning, middle, or end; or else definitely, in reference to such distinctions."—Harris: Hermes, bk. i., ch. vii.

tēnse'-lỹ, adv. [Eng. tense, a.; -ly.] In a tense manner; tightly; with tension.

tēnse'-nēss, s. [Eng. tense, a.; -ness.] The quality or state of being tense or stretched to stiffness; stiffness, tension.

"Should the pain and tenseness of the part continue, the operation must take place."—Sharp: Surgery.

těn-sĩ-bĩl'-ĩ-tỹ, s. [Eng. tensile; -ity.] The quality or state of being tensile or tensile; tensility.

těn-sĩ-ble, a. [Eng. tens(e), a.; -ible.] Capable of being extended; tensile.

"Gold is the closest and therefore the heaviest of metals, and is likewise the most flexible and tensile."—Bacon: Nat. Hist., § 327.

těn-sĩle, a. [Lat. tensus=tense (q.v.).]

1. Of or pertaining to tension; as, tensile strength.
2. Capable of being extended or drawn out in length or breadth.

"All bodies ductile and tensile, as metals that will be drawn into wires, have the appetite of not discontinuing."—Bacon: Nat. Hist., § 345.

tensile-strength, subst. The cohesive power by which a material resists an attempt to pull it apart in the direction of its fibers. This bears no relation to its capacity for resisting compression.

těn-sĩled, a. [Eng. tensile (e); -ed.] Rendered capable of tension; made tensile.

těn-sĩl'-ĩ-tỹ, s. [Eng. tensile (e); -ity.] The quality or state of being tensile.

"The libration or reciprocation of the spirits in the tensility of the muscles would not be so perpetual."—More: Immort. of the Soul, bk. ii., ch. x.

těn-sĩon, s. [Fr., from Lat. tensionem, accus. of tensio=a stretching, from tensus, pa. par. of tendo=to stretch; Sp. tension; Ital. tensione.]

1. Ordinary Language:

1. Literally:

(1) The act of stretching or straining.

"It can have nothing of vocal sound, voice being raised by a stiff tension of the larynx."—Holder.

(2) The state of being stretched or strained to stiffness; the state of being bent or strained.

"The string which is constantly kept in a state of tension will vibrate on the slightest impulse."—Knox: Essays, No. 21.

2. Fig.: Mental strain, stretch, or application; strong or severe intellectual effort or exertion; strong excitement of feeling; great activity or strain of the emotions or will.

II. Technically:

1. Elect.: Electro-motive force. It is measured by the electrometer.

2. Mech.: The strain or the force by which the bar, rod, or string is pulled when forming part of a system in equilibrium or in motion. Thus, when a cord supports a weight, the tension at every part of the string is equal to that weight.

3. Pneum.: The expansibility or elastic force of gaseous bodies, whence gases are sometimes called elastic fluids.

4. Sewing-mach.: A pressure upon the thread to prevent its running too easily from the spool.

tension-bridge, s. A bridge constructed on the principle of the bow, the arch supporting the track by means of tension-rods, and the string acting as a tie.

tension-rod, s. A stay or tie-rod in a truss or structure, which connects opposite parts and prevents their spreading asunder.

tension-spring, s. A spring for wagons, railway-carriages, &c.

těn'-sioned, a. [Eng. tension; -ed.] Subjected to tension or drawing out; in a state of tension; tense, drawn out, extended.

těn'-ĩ-tỹ, s. [Eng. tens(e), a.; -ity.] The state of being tense; tension, tenseness.

těn'-ĩve, a. [Eng. tens(e), a.; -ive.] Giving a sensation of tension, stiffness, or contraction.

"From choler is a hot burning pain; a beating pain from the pulse of the artery; a tensive pain from distension of the parts by the fullness of humor."—Floyer: On Humors.

těn'-sōme, a. [TENDSOME.]

těn'-sōn, s. [TENZON.]

těn'-sōr, s. [Latin tensus, pa. par. of tendo=to stretch.]

Anat.: Any muscle which stretches the part on which it specially operates; as, the tensor palati, the tensor tarsi, &c.

těn'-sure (s as sh), s. [English tens(e); -ure.] Tension; the act of stretching; the state of being stretched.

"This motion upon pressure, and the reciprocal thereof, motion upon tensure, we call motion of liberty, which is, when any body being forced to a preternatural extent restoreth itself to the natural."—Bacon.

těnt (1), tente, s. [Fr. tente, from Low Latin tenta=a tent, prop. fem. sing. of tentus, pa. par. of tendo=to stretch; Sp. tienda; Port. & Ital. tenda; Lat. tentorium.]

1. A portable pavilion or lodge, consisting of some flexible material, such as skins, matting, canvas, or other strong textile fabric, stretched over and supported on poles. Among uncivilized and wandering tribes tents have been the ordinary dwelling-places from the earliest times, but among civilized nations they are principally used as temporary lodgings for soldiers when engaged in the field, for travelers on an expedition, or for providing accommodation, refreshment, &c., for large bodies of people collected together out of doors on some special occasion, as at horse-races, fairs, cricket-matches, or the like. Military tents are made of canvas, supported by one or more poles, and distended by means of ropes fastened to pegs driven into the ground. Tents of a large size, such as are used for out-of-door fêtes, are known as marquees.

"Now man the next, receding toward the main, Wedged in one body, at the tents they stand."
Pope: Homer's Iliad, xv. 788.

2. An apparatus used in field-photography; a substitute for the usual dark room. It consists of a box provided with a yellow glass window in front, and furnished with drapery at the back, so as to cover the operator and prevent access of light to the interior. It is usually provided with shelves and racks inside, developing-tray, and a vessel of water overhead, having an elastic tube passing to the inside, to convey water for washing the plate.

†3. A kind of pulpit of wood erected out-of-doors, in which clergymen used to preach when the people were too numerous to be accommodated within-doors. (Still sometimes used.) (Scotch.)

4. A Rechabite lodge (Jeremiah xxxv. 7). [RECHABITE, 3.]

"The sick funds in the possession of the various tents."
—Rechabite Magazine, July, 1886, p. 151.

tent-bed, s. A high-post bedstead, having curtains in a tent form above.

tent-caterpillar, subst. The larva of a moth, Clisiocampa americana, destructive to the apple and cherry-tree.

tent-maker, s. One who makes tents, or weaves the cloth for tents. (Acts xviii. 3.)

tent-peg, subst. A peg of wood, driven into the ground, to which the tent ropes are fastened.

tent-pegging, s. A game or sport consisting in trying to pick a tent-peg out of the ground with a spear or lance while riding at full speed.

"Colonel —, who reopened an old wound while engaged in the game of tent-pegging, died last night."—London Standard.

tent-stitch, subst. A kind of fancy stitch in worsted work.

"She does, core of my heart—she does—and is as ignorant of music as I am of tent-stitch."—Lord Lytton: My Novel, ch. xii.

tent-tree, s.

Bot.: Pandanus fosteri, found in Lord Howe's Island.

těnt (2), s. [Contract. from attent or attention.] Attention, caution, care, notice.

"Canny now, lad—canny now—tak tent and tak time."—Scott: Antiquary, ch. vii.

těnt (3), tente, subst. [Fr., from Lat. tento=to handle, to touch, to test; Fr. tenter=to tempt, to prove, to try; Sp. tienta=a probe; tiento=a touch.] Surgical:

*1. A probe.

"Modest doubt is called
The beacon of the wise; the tent that searches
To the bottom of the worst."

Shakesp.: Troilus and Cressida, ii. 2.

2. A roll of lint, sponge, &c., of cylindrical or conical shape, introduced into an ulcer or wound to keep the external portion open and induce it to heal from the bottom. [SPONGE-TENT.]

těnt (4), s. [Sp. (vino) tinto=deep red (wine); tinto=deep-colored, from Lat. tinctus, pa. par. of tingo=to dye.] A kind of wine of a deep red color, chiefly from Galicia or Malaga in Spain. It is principally used for sacramental purposes.

"While the tinker did dine, he had plenty of wine, Rich canary with sherry and tent superfine."

Percy: Reliques, I. ii. 16.

těnt (1), v. i. [TENT (1), s.] To lodge, as in a tent; to tabernacle.

"The smiles of knaves
Tent in my cheeks, and schoolboys' tears take up
The glasses of my sight."

Shakesp.: Coriolanus, iii. 2.

těnt (2), v. i. & t. [TENT (2), s.]

A. Intrans.: To attend; to observe attentively. (Followed by to.)

B. Trans.: To observe, to remark, to notice, to regard. (Scotch.)

těnt (3), v. t. [TENT (3), s.]

1. To probe; to search, as with a tent.

"I'll observe his looks;
I'll tent him to the quick."

Shakesp.: Hamlet, ii. 2.

2. To keep open, as a wound, with a tent or pledget.

těn-tă-cle, s. [Fr., from Low Lat. tentaculum (q.v.).]

Zoöl. (pl.): Feelers; delicate organs of touch or of prehension possessed by many of the lower animals; as the Medusidæ, the Polyzoa, the Cephalopods, &c.

těn-tăc'-u-lă, s. pl. [TENTACULUM.]

těn-tăc'-u-lăr, adj. [Low Lat. tentacul(um); Eng. adj. suff. -ar.] Of or pertaining to a tentacle or tentacles; in the nature of a tentacle or tentacles.

"Tentaculate appendage laterally developed."—Kent: Infusoria, ii. 807.

těn-tăc'-u-lĩf'-ěr-a, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. tentacula, pl. of tentaculum (q.v.), and fero=to bear.]

Zoöl.: An order of Infusoria, or a class of Protozoa. Animalcules bearing neither flagellate appendages nor cilia in their adult state, but seizing their food and effecting locomotion, when unattached, through the medium of tentacle-like processes developed from the cuticular surface or internal parenchyma; these tentacles are simply adhesive or tubular, and provided at their distal extremity with a cup-like sucking-disc, an endoplast, and one or more contractile vesicles usually conspicuously developed; trichocysts rarely, if ever, present; increasing by longitudinal or transverse fission, or by external and internal bud-formation. They inhabit salt and fresh water; and are divided into two groups; Suctoria, in which the tentacles are wholly or partially suctorial, and Actinaria, in which they are merely adhesive.

těn-tăc'-u-lĩf'-ěr-oũs, adj. [TENTACULIFERA.] Bearing or producing tentacles.

těn-tă-cũ'-lĩ-form, a. [Lat. tentaculum=a tentacle, and forma=form.] Shaped like a tentacle.

těn-tăc'-u-līte, s. [TENTACULITES.]

Palæont.: Any individual of the genus Tentaculites.

tentaculite-beds, s. pl.

Geology: Beds of Middle Devonian age, in North Devonshire, England, and in Germany.

těn-tăc'-u-lī-tēs, s. [Mod. Lat. tentacul(um); suff. -ites.]

Palæontol.: A genus of organisms, generally referred to the Annelida, but stated by S. P. Woodward, &c., to be more properly classed under the Pteropoda, or perhaps with Orthoceras (q. v.). There is a straight conical shelly tube, annulated and sometimes striated. The walls of the shell are thin, and it is open at the thick end. Found in the Silurian and Devonian rocks. Tentaculites annulatus is a characteristic Lower Silurian fossil.

těn-tăc'-u-lūm (pl. těn-tăc'-u-lā), s. [Latin, from tento=to feel, to try.] The same as TENTACLE (q. v.).

*tēnt'-age (age as íg), subst. [Eng. tent (1), s.; -age.] A collection of tents; an encampment.

"Upon the mount the king his tentage fixed."
Drayton: Barons Wars, ii. 15.

*těn-tā'-tion, *ten-ta-ci-on, s. [Lat. tentatio, from tentatus, pa. par. of tento=to try.] [TEMPTATION.] Trial, temptation.

"If at any time through the frailty of our wretched nature and the violence of tentation, we be drawn into a sinful action, yet let us take heed of being leavened with wickedness."—Ep. Hall: Remains.

těn-tā-tīve, a. & s. [Latin tentativus=trying, tentative, from tentatus, pa. par. of tento=to try; Fr. tentatif; Sp. tentativo.]

A. As adj.: Based on or consisting in experiment; experimental, empirical.

"The tentative edict of Constantius described many false hearts."—Ep. Hall: Remains, p. 15.

†B. As subst.: An essay, an experiment, a trial.

"The various tentatives of the early thinkers had all ended in a scepticism which was turned to dexterous use by the Sophists."—Lewes: History of Philosophy (ed. 1880), i. 338.

těn-tā-tīve-lý, adv. [Eng. tentative; -ly.] In a tentative manner; by way of experiment or trial.

těnt'-ěd, a. [Eng. tent (1), s.; -ed.] Furnished or covered with tents.

"The palisade,
That closed the tented ground."

Scott: Marmion, v. 1.

těnt'-ěr (1), s. [Eng. tent (2), v.; -er.] A person in a manufactory who tends to or looks after a machine, or set of machines, so that they may be in proper working order, as a loom-tenter. He may also have the supervision of a certain number of the hands employed on such machines.

těnt'-ěr (2), *teint-er, *tent-ar, *tent-ure, *tent-our, *tent-owre, s. [Prop. tenture, from Fr. tenture=a stretching, extending; Lat. tentura=a stretching, from tentus, pa. par. of tendo=to stretch.]

1. A frame used to stretch pieces of cloth, to make them set even and square.
2. A drying-room.
3. A tenter-hook.

"Ye haue streigned it on the tentours, and drawn it on the perche."—Golden Boke, let. 5

*¶ On the tenters: [TENTER-HOOK, ¶.]

tenter-bar, s. A device for stretching cloth.

tenter-ground, s. Ground on which frames for stretching cloth are erected. [TENTER (2), 1.]

"I could distinguish only a shadow of the castle on a hill, and tenter-grounds spread far and wide round the town."—Gray: Letter to Dr. Wharton.

tenter-hook, s.

1. Lit.: One of a set of hooks arranged on the inside margin of a frame and used in stretching cloth, the margin of which is held fast by the hooks.
2. Fig.: Anything that painfully strains, racks, or tortures.

¶ On tenter-hooks, *On the tenters: On the stretch; on the rack; in a state of suspense or anxiety.

těnt'-ěr, v. t. & i. [TENTER (2), s.]

A. Trans.: To hang, stretch, or strain on or as on tenters.

"When leather or cloth is tentered, it springeth back."—Bacon: Natural History, § 22.

B. Intrans.: To admit of being stretched by a tenter.

"Woolen cloth will tenter."—Bacon: Nat. Hist.

*těntes, s. pl. [Etym. doubtful; cf. Fr. tentes=tents.]

Bot.: The catkins of Juglans regia. (Lyte.)

těnth, *tenthe, *teonthe, a. & s. [A. S. teóðha; Icel. tiundi.]

A. As adj.: The ordinal of ten; coming next after the ninth.

"It may be thought the less strange, if others cannot do as much at the tenth or twentieth trial as we did after much practice."—Boyle.

B. As substantive:

I. Ord. Lang.: A tenth part; one of ten equal parts into which anything is or may be divided; a tithe.

II. Technically:

Music:

1. A compound interval, which comprises an octave and a third, nine conjoint degrees, or ten sounds. The tenth is the octave of the third, and may be major or minor, diminished or augmented.
2. An organ stop, tuned a tenth above the diapasons, called also double tierce or decima.

těnth'-lý, adv. [Eng. tenth; -ly.] In the tenth place.

těn-thrě-dīn'-i-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. tenthred(o), genit. tenthredin(is); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idae.]

Entom.: Sawflies; a family of Hymenoptera, tribe Phytophaga. The ovipositor is a saw-like blade of two lateral pieces at the apical end of the abdomen. Antennæ generally short with three to thirty joints, sometimes pectinated in the males. Maxillary palpi with six joints; prothorax produced at the sides to the origin of the four wings; anterior tibiae with two spurs at the apex. The males are generally darker in color than the females. The female, by the saw of the ovipositor, makes slits in the leaves or tender shoots of plants, and then separating the two pieces, deposits her eggs between them. The larvæ have eighteen to twenty-two feet; they are like those of the Lepidoptera, but want the circles of hooked bristles, and have only a simple eye on each side of the forehead. The cocoon is of the texture of parchment, or may resemble lattice, or both characteristics may be present. It is attached to the plant or tree on which the larvæ feed or is buried in the ground. About a thousand species are known. The larvæ are very destructive to crops. [ATHALIA.]

těn-thrě-dō, s. [Gr. tenthredōn=a kind of wasp or fly.]

Entom.: Sawfly, the typical genus of Tenthredinidae. Upper wings with four submarginal cells; antennæ with the third and fourth joints of the same length. Tenthredo cethiops, a small black species, deposits eggs on cherry and other fruit trees. The larvæ are black, and often numerous enough to do the trees great damage. Tenthredo grossulariæ is the Gooseberry Sawfly.

těnt'-ie, a. [Eng. tent (2), s.; -ie=-y.] Heedful, cautious. (Scotch.)

"Jean slips in twa with tentie e'e."

Burns: Halloween.

*těn-tīg'-īn-oūs, a. [Lat. tentigo (genit. tentiginis)=a stretching, lasciviousness.]

1. Stiff, stretched.
2. Lustful, lecherous.

"Nothing affects the head so much as a tentiginous humor, repelled and elated to the upper region."—Swift: Mechanical Operations of the Spirit.

těnt'-lěss, a. [Eng. tent (2), s.; -less.] Heedless, careless. (Scotch.)

"I'll wander on, with tentless heed."

Burns: To James Smith.

těn-tōr'-ī-ūm, s. [Lat.=a tent (q. v.).]

Anat.: An arched or vaulted partition, stretched across the cerebrum and the cerebellum.

*těnt'-ōr-ý, s. [Lat. tensorium=a tent.] The textile fabric of a tent.

"The women who are said to weave hangings and curtains for the grove, were no other than makers of tentories, to spread from tree to tree."—Evelyn: Sylva, bk. iv, § 8.

*těnt'-ure, s. [Fr.] [TENTER, s.] Paperhangings, wall-paper.

těnt'-wōrt, s. [First element doubtful; Britten & Holland quote a statement by Threlkeld that the plant was named because it was a specific against the "taint" or swelling of the joints in rickets.]

Bot.: Asplenium ruta muraria.

*těn'-u-āte, v. t. [Latin tenuatus, pa. par. of tenuo=to make thin; tenuis=thin.] To make thin.

těn'-u-ēs, s. pl. [Lat., pl. of tenuis=thin.]

Gram.: A term applied to the letters k, p, t, of the Greek alphabet, in relation to their respective middle letters g, b, d, and their aspirates ch, ph, th. These terms are also applied to the corresponding letters and articulate elements in any language.

těn-u-i-fō'-īl-oūs, a. [Latin tenuis=thin, and folium=a leaf.]

Bot.: Having thin or narrow leaves.

těn'-u-i-oūs, a. [Latin tenuis=thin.] Rare or subtle; tenuous. (Opposed to dense.)

"The most tenuous, pure, and simple matter."—Glanvill: Preëxistence of Souls, ch. xiv.

†těn'-u-i-rōs'-tēr, s. [TENUIROSTRES.]

Zool.: Any individual member of the group Tenuirostres (q. v.).

†těn'-u-i-rōs'-tral, a. [TENUIROSTRES.] Of or pertaining to the Tenuirostres; slender-beaked.

"The gallatorial or tenuirostral type is shown in birds, as in quadrupeds, by a great slenderness and elongation of the jaws, muzzle, or bill."—Swainson: Birds, i. 10.

†těn'-u-i-rōs'-trēs, s. pl. [Latin tenuis=thin, slender, and rostrum=a beak.]

Ornith.: A division of Insectores, having a long and slender beak tapering to a point. Toes large and slender, especially the hind one, the outer usually more or less united to the middle one at the base. They live on juices of plants or on insects. Families, Certhiidae, Meliphagidae, Trochilidae, Promeropidae, and Upupidae.

těn'-u-is, s. [Lat.=thin.]

Gram.: One of the tenues (q. v.).

těn'-ū-i-tý, *ten-u-i-tie, s. [Fr. tenuité, from Latin tenuitatem, accus. of tenuitas, from tenuis=thin.]

1. The quality or state of being tenuous or thin; thinness, slenderness; smallness in diameter.

"In the iris of the eye, and the drum of the ear, the tenuity of the muscles is astonishing."—Paley: Natural Theology, ch. ix.

2. Rarity, rareness, thinness, as of a fluid; as, the tenuity of the atmosphere.

*3. Simplicity, plainness; absence of grandeur; meanness.

*4. Poverty.

"The tenuity and contempt of clergymen will soon let them see what a poor carcass they are, when parted from the influence of that supremacy."—King Charles: Eikon Basilike.

těn'-u-oūs, a. [Lat. tenuis=thin, slender.]

1. Thin, small, slender, minute.
2. Rare, rarefied; subtle, not dense.

těn'-ure, s. [Fr., from Low Lat. tenura, from Lat. teneo=to hold.]

1. The act, manner, or right of holding property, especially real estate. Land may be held according to two main principles, feudal or allodial (see these words). The former is the principle universal in England. In the United States the title to land is essentially allodial, and every tenant in fee-simple has an absolute and perfect title. Yet in technical language his estate is called an estate in fee-simple, and the tenure free and common socage. (Kent.)

2. The consideration, condition, or service, which the occupier of land gives to his landlord for the use of his land.

3. Manner of holding in general; the terms or conditions upon which anything is held or retained.

"All that seems thine own Held by the tenure of his will alone."

Cowper: Expostulation, 673.

tē-nū'-tō, a. [Ital.=held.]

Music: A term applied to a note or series of notes having to be held or kept sounding the full time.

těn'-zōn, těn'-sōn, s. [Fr. tenson; Ital. tenzone; from Low Lat. tionem, accus. of tenio=a contending, a contest, from Lat. tensus, pa. par. of tendo=to stretch.] A contention in verse between rival troubadours before a tribunal of love or gallantry; hence, a subdivision of a chanson composed by one of the contestants or competitors.

tē-ō-cāl'-īl, s. [Mex.=God's house.]

Antiq.: The name given to the temples of the aborigines of Mexico. They were built in the form of a four-sided pyramid, in two, three, or more stories, or terraces, on the highest of which the temple proper was situated. The Teocallis of Yucatan are not built in terraces, but rise at an angle of 45° to the platforms on which the temple is placed. [PYRAMID, 2.]

"A spacious and imposing building, erected on the ruins of the great teocalli, or temple of the Aztec god, Mixitli."—Chambers' Encyc., vi. 436.

tē-ō-pān, s. [Mex.=place of God.] The same as TEOCALLI (q. v.).

tē'-pal, subst. [Altered from petal, and with a reference to sepal.]

Botany:

1. A petal. 2. One of the portions of a perianth.

tē'-pēe, s. An American Indian wigwam.

tēp'-ē-făc'-tion, *tēp'-ī-făc'-tion, subst. [Lat. tepefactus, pa. par. of tepefacio=to tepefy (q. v.).] The act or operation of warming or making tepid or moderately warm.

tēp'-ē-fý, *tēp'-ī-fý, v. t. & i. [Lat. tepefacio, from tepeo=to be warm, and facio=to make.]

fâte, fât, färe, amidst, whât, fáll, father; wê, wêt, hère, camêl, hêr, thêre; pine, pît, sire, sîr, marine; gô, pôl, or, wôre, wôlf, wôrk, whô, sôn; mûte, cûb, cûre, ûnite, cûr, rûle, fûll; trý, Sýrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ä. qu = kw.

A. Trans.: To make tepid or moderately warm.

"They (pike) lie close to the bottom, where the water is most warm, and seldom venture out, except the day be particularly fine, and the shallows at the edges of the stream become tepified by the powerful rays of the sun."—Goldsmith: Animated Nature, iv, 233.

B. Intransitive: To become tepid or moderately warm.

tê-pê-jî-lô-tê (j as h), subst. [Native name in Central America.]

Bot.: The young, unexpanded flower-buds of a species of Chamædorea (q. v.); highly esteemed as a vegetable.

têph-ræ-ôps, s. [Gr. tephra=ashes, and ôps=the face, the countenance.]

Ichthy.: A genus of Sparidae, group Cantharina, from Chinese, Japanese, and Australian seas.

têph-ra-măn-çy, s. [Gr. tephra=ashes, and manteia=prophecy, divination.] Divination by the inspection of the ashes of a sacrifice.

têph-rîne, têph-rîte, s. [Gr. tephra=cinders, ashes; suff. -ine, -ite.]

Petrol.: A name originally given to a gray, ash-like rock of loose texture, the base of which was trachytic. Subsequent investigation has shown, however, that it consists of a plagioclase felspar, associated with either nepheline or leucite, and sometimes with both, and also several accessory minerals. This name has been until recently used by French geologists; but Rosenbusch (Mikroskopische Physiographie d. massigen Gesteine, Stuttgart, 1877) has adopted it as a designation of a "family" of rocks, most of which are equivalent to the phonolites (q. v.).

têph-rî-tis, s. [Mod. Lat., from Gr. tephra=ashes.]

Ichthy.: A genus of Pleuronectidae (q. v.), allied to Hippoglossus. The mouth is nearly symmetrical, and the dorsal commences above the eye.

têph-rôd-or-nis, s. [Gr. tephrodês=ash-colored, and ornis=a bird. Named from their somber plumage.]

Ornith.: A genus of Prionopidae (in some classifications, of Laniidae, when they are placed in the sub-family Dierurinae), with four species, from the Oriental region. The frontal feathers are bristly and incurved. They go about in small flocks, carefully hunting for the insects on which they feed.

têph-rô-măn-çy, *têph-rô-măn-ti-a (ti as shi), s. [TEPHRAMANCY.]

têph-rô-şî-a, s. [Mod. Lat., from Gr. tephros=ash-colored.]

1. Botany: A genus of Galegeæ. Tropical or subtropical trees, shrubs, or herbs, usually with unequally pinnated leaves, covered with a gray silky down, and lanceolate or subulate stipules. Flowers mostly in axillary racemes, white or purplish; calyx campanulate, with five nearly equal teeth; stamens in one or two bundles; legume linear, compressed, straight, or curved, many-seeded. The young branches of Tephrosia toxicaria and T. cinerea, West Indian plants, with the leaves pounded and sometimes mixed with quicklime, are thrown into pools and mountain streams to poison fish. The smaller fry die; the larger fishes, though temporarily stupefied, generally recover. An infusion of the seeds of T. purpurea, a copiously branched perennial, one or two feet high, common in India, is given as a cooling medicine. A decoction of the bitter root is given in dyspepsia, lenteria, tympanitis, &c. T. senna is used as a purgative by the inhabitants of Popayan. A blue dye is extracted from T. tinctoria, an undershrub growing in Mysore, &c. T. apollinea in Nubia and T. toxicaria in the Niger region are also dye plants.

2. Entom.: A genus of Geometer Moths, family Boarmidae.

têp-id, a. [Lat. tepidus, from tepeo=to be warm, from same root as Sansc. tap=to burn.] Moderately warm; lukewarm.

"Through the tepid gleams Deep musing, then he best exerts his song."

Thomson: Autumn, 1, 324.

têp-i-dâr-i-ûm, s. [Latin, from tepidus=tepid (q. v.).]

Roman Antiq.: An apartment in Roman baths where the tepid water was placed; also the boiler in which the water was warmed for the tepid bath.

têp-id-i-tý, s. [Fr. tepidité, from Lat. tepidus=tepid.] The quality or state of being tepid or lukewarm. (Lit. & fig.)

"The tepidity and infidell baseness of the Jewish nation."—Ep. Taylor: Life of Christ, pt. i., § 4.

têp-id-ness, s. [Eng. tepid; -ness.] Tepidity, lukewarmness.

tê-por, subst. [Latin.] Gentle heat, moderate warmth.

"The small pox, mortal during such a season, grew more favorable by the tepor and moisture in April."—Arbuthnot.

têq-êz-quite (q as k), s. [A corrupt. of Tequixquilt, the Mexican name for a mineral substance found at Texcoco, Zumpango.]

Min.: A mixture of various salts, consisting principally of carbonate of soda and chloride of sodium (common salt).

têr-a-crýl-ic, a. [Eng. ter(ebic), and acrylic.] Derived from or containing terebic and acrylic acid.

teracrylic-acid, s. [PYROTEREBIC-ACID.]

têr-a-phîm, subst. pl. [Heb. teraphim, perhaps from an obsolete verb teraph=to live agreeably or in plenty. (Gesenius.)]

Jewish Antiq.: Household gods, like the Roman Penates. The "images" which Rachel stole from her father Laban are called in Hebrew teraphim (Gen. xxxi. 19, 34, 35). Perhaps they were the "strange gods" given up by Jacob's household, and by him hid under the "oak" at Shechem (xxxv. 2, 4). Again, the "image" which Michal put in David's bed, and which was intended to be mistaken for him, is called in Hebrew teraphim, a plural form, though apparently only with a singular meaning. It was probably of the human form and size (1 Sam. xix. 13). Micah manufactured one or more (Judges xvii. 5, xviii. 14, 17, 18, 20). Teraphim are often mentioned in connection with ephods, and in Zech. x. 2, it is stated that the teraphim (A. V. idols) have spoken vanity, implying that they were consulted as oracles by the Jews, as ephods were (1 Sam. xxiii. 9, 12, xxx. 7). The Babylonians used them for a similar purpose (Ezek. xxi. 21). Samuel denounced them (1 Sam. xv. 23), and Josiah put them away, with wizards, idols, &c. (2 Kings xxiii. 24). The English reader must have recourse to the R. V. to find where the word teraphim occurs in the Old Testament, as in all but one passage (Hosea iii. 4) the A. V. translates it by other words.

têr-a-pîn, s. [TERRAPIN.]

têr-âs, s. [Gr. teras=a monster.]

Entom.: A genus of Cynipidae. The puncture by Teras terminalis of oak twigs produces the gall called oak-apple.

tê-rât-ic-al, adj. [Gr. teras (genit. teratos)=a sign, a wonder.] Marvelous, wonderful, miraculous.

têr-ât-ich-thýs, subst. [Pref. terat(o)-, and Gr. ichthys=a fish.]

Palæont.: A genus of Gymnodontidae.

têr-a-tô, pref. [TERATICAL.] Marvelous; of or belonging to monsters or anything wonderful.

têr-a-tôg-ên-y, s. [Pref. terato-, and Gr. gennaô=to produce.]

Med.: The formation of monsters.

têr-ât-ô-lite, s. [Pref. terato-, and Gr. lithos=a stone; Lat. terra miraculosa; Ger. wundererde.]

Min.: An impure variety of lithomarge (q. v.), found at Planitz, Saxony.

têr-a-tô-lôg-ic-al, adj. [English teratolog(y); -ical.] Of or pertaining to teratology; dealing with or treating of monsters or marvels.

têr-a-tôl-ô-gist, s. [Eng. teratolog(y); -ist.]

*1. One given to teratology; one who deals in marvels; a marvel-monger.

*2. One who studies or is versed in the science of teratology.

têr-a-tôl-ô-gý, s. [Pref. terato-, and Gr. logos=a word, a discourse.]

*1. That branch of biological science which deals with monsters, malformations, or deviations from the normal types in the animal and vegetable kingdoms.

*2. Affectation of sublimity in language; bombast. (Bailey.)

têr-a-tô-sâu-rûs, s. [Pref. terato-, and Greek sauros=a lizard.]

Palæont.: A genus of Triassic Dinosaurs.

têr-bî-ûm, s. [From Ytterby in Sweden.]

Chem.: A metal, supposed by Mosander in 1843 to exist, together with erbium and yttrium, in gadolinite. Subsequent investigations have thrown considerable doubt on its existence, and it is now believed to be yttria contaminated with the oxides of the cerium metals.

têrçe, *tyerse, s. [Fr. masc. tiers, fem. tierce=third; tiers=a third part, a tierce, from Lat. tertius, fem. tertia=third.] [TIERCE.]

*1. A third part, a third.

"The middle between them both is 50 degrees and a tierce in latitude."—Hackluyt: Voyages, iii, 210.

*2. Measures, &c.: A cask whose contents are forty-two gallons, the third of a pipe or butt.

"For I search'd every piece of wine; yes sure, sir,
And every little tierce, that could but testifie."
Beaum. & Flet.: The Pilgrim, ii, 1.

*3. Eccles.: The same as TIERCE, II, 2.

*4. Scots Law: A real right, whereby a widow who has not accepted any special provision is entitled to a life-rent of one-third of the heritage in which her husband died infert, provided the marriage has endured for a year and a day, or has produced a living child. No widow is entitled to her tierce until she is regularly kenmed to it. [KEN, v., A. II.]

terce-major, s.

Cards: A sequence of the three best cards in some games.

têr-çel, *ter-cell, tas-sel, s. & a. [O. Fr. tiercelet, so called because he is commonly a third less than the female, from O. Fr. tiers, tierce=third [TIERCE]; cf. O. Ital. terzolo; Ital. terzuolo, from terzo=third.]

A. As subst.: The male of the falcon, espec. the common or Peregrine Falcon (Falco peregrinus).

*B. As adj.: Male.

têrçe-lêt, s. [O. Fr. tiercelet.] [TIERCEL.] The male hawk; the male eagle.

têr-çel-lêne, s. [TIERCEL.] A small male hawk; a tiercelet.

têr-çên-tên-a-rý, †têr-çên-tên-a-rý, *têr-çên-tên-a-rý, a. & s. [Lat. ter=thrice, and centenarius=centenary (q. v.).]

A. As adj.: Comprising three hundred years; including or relating to an interval of three hundred years.

B. As subst.: A day celebrated or observed as a festival in commemoration of some event, as a great victory, &c., which occurred three hundred years before.

"Their noble president had accustomed himself to say 'tercentenary.' But all long words that ended in 'ary,' 'ery,' 'ory,' were accented on the fourth syllable from the end, or what scholars called the 'preantepenultimate.' (Laughter.) If his lordship's attention were called to that little law, he would adapt his pronunciation to the common one, and would speak of the 'ter-cent-enary.'"—London Daily News.

têrç-êr, s. [Eng. terc(e); -er.]

Law: A tenant in dower; a dowress.

têrç-êt, s. [Fr., from tiers=third.]

1. Music: A third.

2. Poetry: A group of three rhyming lines; a triplet.

têr-çîne, s. [Fr., from Lat. tertius=third.]

Bot.: Mirbel's name for what he considered a third coating of some seeds, internal to the secundine and primine. It is really only a layer of the primine or secundine, or the secundine itself. Called by Malpighi the Chorion.

†tere, s. [TARE (1), s.] têr-ê-bâm-ic, adj. [Eng. tereb(ic), and amic.] Derived from or containing terebic acid and ammonia.

Chem.: $C_7H_{11}NO_3 = (C_7H_5O_2) \cdot \left\{ \begin{smallmatrix} H_2 \\ H \end{smallmatrix} \right\} \cdot \left\{ \begin{smallmatrix} N \\ O \end{smallmatrix} \right\}$. Terebamide.

Prepared by heating terebic acid in ammonia gas to 140-160°. It is slightly soluble in cold, very soluble in hot water and in alcohol.

têr-ê-bâm-ide, s. [Eng. tereb(ic), and amide.] [TEREBAMIC-ACID.]

têr-ê-bâte, s. [Eng. tereb(ic); -ate.]

Chem.: A salt of terebic acid.

têr-ê-bêl-la, s. [Dimin. from Lat. terebra=a boring instrument.]

1. Surg.: A trepan or trephine.

2. Zoöl.: The typical genus of Terebellidae (q. v.). The sheath consists of sand, pieces of shell, and other adventitious particles, held together by a glutinous secretion, from the body. The young when first they quit the eggs, are small, globular embryos, thickly covered with cilia. Then the body becomes elongate and the cilia collect in a band round the middle; eyes appear. Next the cilia diminish in size and disappear, the animal becomes able to creep along the bottom of the water; finally it builds its tube and moves about no more.

Terebella Emmalina.

têr-ê-bêl-lî-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. terebell(a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Zoöl.: A large family of Tubicolæ. Animals sometimes eight or nine inches long, worm-shaped, bôil, bôy; pout, jôwl; cat, çell, chorus, çin, bench; go, gem: thin, this; sin, aş; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f. -cian, -tian = şan. -tion, -sion = şün; tion, -şion = zhün -tious, -cious. -sious = şüs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bël, dël.

thick in front and narrow behind, cephalic region often with a collar; tentacles numerous, filiform, in two groups around the mouth; no proboscis; branched or pectinate branchiæ on some of the anterior segments.

těr'-ě-bēne, s. [Lat. terebinthus]=turpentine; suff. -ene.]

Chem.: $C_{10}H_{16}$. An optically inactive isomer of oil of turpentine, prepared by the action of strong sulphuric acid on terebenthene. It has the odor of thyme-oil; specific gravity, 0.864, and boils at 156°.

těr'-ě-bēn'-ic, a. [TEREBIC.]

těr'-ě-bēn'-thēne, s. [TEREBENE.]

Chem.: $C_{10}H_{16}$. Berthelot's name for the chief constituent found in French oil of turpentine, and readily obtained by neutralizing the oil with an alkaline carbonate, and distilling first over the water-bath, and then in a vacuum. It has a specific gravity=0.864, boils at 161°, and has a specific rotatory power of -42.3.

těr'-ě-bēn'-tīl'-ic, a. [English terebent(hene); -il, -ic.] Pertaining to or derived from terebenthene.

terebentilic-acid, s.

Chemistry: $C_8H_{10}O_2 = C_6H_6 \left\{ \begin{array}{l} CH_3 \\ CO \cdot OH \end{array} \right.$. A monobasic acid obtained by passing the vapor of turpentine over soda-lime, heated to 400°, and treating the resulting mass with hydrochloric-acid. It is heavier than water, melts at 90°, boils at 250°, is slightly soluble in boiling water, but very soluble in alcohol and ether. Its vapor is acrid.

těr'-ě-bēn'-zic, a. [English tere(bene), and benz(o)ic.] Derived from or containing terebene.

terebenzic-acid, s.

Chem.: $C_{14}H_{17}O_4(?)$. Produced by the action of nitric acid on oil of turpentine. It crystallizes in small shining needles, insoluble in cold, soluble in boiling water and in cold alcohol, melts at 169°, and boils at a much higher temperature.

tě-rěb'-ic, a. [Eng. tereb(ene); -ic.] Pertaining to or derived from terebene.

Chem.: $C_7H_{10}O_4 = (C_7H_5O_2)'' \left\{ \begin{array}{l} H_2 \\ H \end{array} \right\} O_2$. Terebenic acid.

Terebilic acid. A dibasic acid prepared by heating oil of turpentine with four parts of nitric acid of specific gravity 1.25. It crystallizes in four-sided, colorless prisms, with oblique terminal faces, dissolves in about 100 parts of cold water, more readily in boiling water, alcohol, and ether; melts at 200° without loss of weight, but at a higher temperature begins to decompose. It forms salts called terebates, of little importance.

terebic-ethers, s. pl.

Chem.: Acid ethers prepared by the direct action of terebic acid on the several alcohols: thus, ethylterebic acid, $C_7H_9(C_2H_5)_4 = \left\{ \begin{array}{l} C_7H_8O_2 \\ C_2H_5 \end{array} \right\} O_2$, is an oil having a burning taste, sparingly soluble in water, and very unstable.

těr'-ě-bīl'-ic, a. [TEREBIC.]

těr'-ě-bīn-tā'-čě-æ, těr'-ě-bīn-thā'-čě-æ, s. pl. [Lat. terebinth(us); fem. pl. adj. suff. -aceæ.]

Bot.: An order founded by Jussieu in 1789, and including all the turpentine-bearing plants. These are now distributed among the orders Amyridaceæ, Anacardiaceæ, Connaraceæ, Xanthoxylaceæ, &c.

těr'-ě-bīnth, subst. [Latin terebinthus; Greek terebinthos=the terebinth or turpentine tree.]

1. Botany:

(1) The terebinth tree (q. v.).

(2) (Pl.): An alternative name for the Anacards. [ANACARDIACEÆ.]

2. Comm. & Pharm.: Various resins, balsams, and spec. Common and Venetian turpentine, and Canada balsam.

terebinth-tree, s.

Bot.: Pistacia terebinthus, the Chio or Cyprus Turpentine tree. Leaves unequally pinnate, generally three pairs with a terminal one; flowers small; fruit small, dark, purple, rounded, and furrowed. The turpentine flows from incisions in the stem, and is left to harden. A gall produced upon the tree by the puncture of insects is used in dyeing, and for tanning one kind of Morocco leather.

těr'-ě-bīn-thī'-nā, s. [TEREBINTH.] An old name for turpentine (q. v.).

těr'-ě-bīnth'-in-āte, a. & s. [Lat. terebinthin(us)]=of the terebinth tree; Eng. suff. -ate.

A. As adj.: Impregnated with the qualities of turpentine; terebinthine.

"During the summer the tree sends out a pleasing terebinthinate odor."—Loudon: Encycl. of Plants (ed. 1890), p. 805.

B. As substantive:

Med.: A preparation of the turpentine of firs.

"Salt serum may be evacuated by urine, by terebinthinates, as tops of pine in all our ale."—Floyer.

těr'-ě-bīn'-thine, a. [Lat. terebinthinus, from terebinthus=the terebinth (q. v.).] Pertaining to turpentine; consisting of turpentine; partaking of the qualities of turpentine.

těr'-ě-bīnth'-ūs, s. [TEREBINTH.]

Bot.: A genus of plants founded by Jussieu, now reduced to a synonym of Pistacia (q. v.).

těr'-ě-brā, s. [Lat.=a boring instrument; tero, =to pierce.]

Zoöl. & Palæont.: Auger-shell; a genus of Buccinidæ (q. v.). Shell long, pointed, many whorled; aperture small; canal short; operculum pointed, nucleus apical. Animal blind, or with eyes near the summit of minute tentacles. All the shells are smooth, and ornamented with variegated spots, generally red, brown, and orange. Recent species 110, mostly tropical. Fossil twenty-four, from the Eocene of Britain, France, and Chili.

těr'-ě-brā'-lī-a, s. pl. [Mod. Lat., from Lat. terebrā=a borer.]

Zoöl.: A sub-genus of Potamides. Shell pyramidal, columella with a prominent fold toward its apex, and a second less distinct one on the basal fronts of the whorls. From India and North Australia. Ter bralia telescopium is so abundant near Calcutta that the shells are burnt for lime. (S. P. Woodward.)

těr'-ě-brant, a. [TEREBRANT.] Possessed of an ovipositor; of or belonging to the Terebrantia.

terebrant-hymenoptera, subst. pl. [TEREBRANTIA (1).]

těr'-ě-brān'-tī-a (tī as shī), s. pl. [Neut. pl. of Lat. terebrans, pr. par. of terebrō=to bore.]

Entomology:

1. Saw-flies; a tribe of Hymenoptera having the ovipositor converted into a saw or borer. Families, Tenthredinidæ and Siricidæ.

2. A tribe of Physopoda in which the females have a regular ovipositor consisting of minute valves concealed in a groove of the last two ventral segments. Antennæ usually nine-jointed. [THRIPS.]

těr'-ě-brāte, v. t. [Lat. terebratus, pa. par. of terebrō=to bore; terebrā=a boring instrument.] To bore, to pierce with or as with a boring instrument.

"Earthworms being made in the most compleat manner possible for terebrating the earth, and creeping where their occasions lead them."—Derham: Physico-Theology, bk. iv., ch. xii.

těr'-ě-brā-těl'-lā, s. [Mod. Lat., dimin. from Lat. terebratus=perforated.]

Zoöl. & Palæont.: A genus of Terebratulidæ (q. v.), with twenty-five species distributed among several sub-genera. Shell smooth or radiately plaited; dorsal valve longitudinally impressed; hinge-line approximately straight; beak with a flattened area on each side of the deltidium, which is incomplete, foramen large; loop attached to the septum. The genus appears first in the Chalk.

těr'-ě-brā'-tion, s. [Lat. terebratio, from terebratus, pa. par. of terebrō=to bore, to perforate; Fr. terébration.] The act of boring, perforating, or piercing.

"It hath been touched before, that terebration of trees doth make them prosper better; but it is found also, that it maketh the fruit sweeter, and better."—Bacon: Nat. Hist., § 463.

těr'-ě-brāt'-ū-lā, subst. [Mod. Lat., dimin. from Lat. terebratus=perforated.]

Zoöl. & Palæont.: The type-genus of Terebratulidæ (q. v.). Shell smooth, convex; beak truncated and perforated; foramen circular; deltidium of two pieces frequently blended; loop very short, simple, attached by its crura to the hinge-plate. Animal attached by a pedicle; brachial disc trilobed, center lobe elongated and spirally convoluted. Terebratula proper has three recent species, from the Mediterranean, Vigo Bay, and the Falkland Islands; fossil, 120, from the Devonian onward. Sub-genera: Terebratulina, Waldheimia, Meganteris, and Rensseleria, the latter from the Silurian to the Devonian.

těr'-ě-brā-tū'-lī-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. terebratul(a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Zoölogy & Palæont.: A family of Brachiopoda (q. v.). Woodward enumerates five genera, to which Tate adds two others. Shell minutely punctate; usually round or oval, smooth or striated; ventral valve with a prominent beak and two curved hinge-teeth; dorsal valve with depressed umbo, a prominent cardinal process between the dental sockets, and a slender shelly loop. Animal attached by a pedicle, or by the ventral valves; oral arms united by a membrane, variously folded, sometimes spiral at their extremities. The family is numerous and widely distributed in time and space. The generic and sub-generic forms are usually classified according to the modifications of the loop or calcified support for the respiratory and alimentary organs, the simplest and highest type of this loop being found in Terebratula (q. v.).

The family was represented in Silurian seas, and reached its maximum about the dawn of the Tertiary epoch, since when many of its representatives have become extinct.

těr'-ě-brā-tū'-lī-form, a. [Mod. Lat. terebratula, and English form.] Shaped like the shell of Terebratula (q. v.).

těr'-ě-brāt'-ū-lī'-nā, s. [Mod. Lat., dimin. from terebratula (q. v.).]

Zoöl. & Palæont.: A sub-genus of Terebratula (q. v.). Loop short, rendered annular in the adult by the union of the oral processes. Recent species six, from the United States, Norway, Cape, and Japan; fossil twenty-two, from the Oxford Clay.

těr'-ě-brāt'-ū-līte, s. [Mod. Lat. terebratul(a); suff. -ite.] Any fossil species of the genus Terebratula (q. v.).

těr'-ě-cām'-phēne, s. [English tere(bene), and camphene.]

Chem.: A solid crystallizable body, somewhat resembling camphor, produced by heating to 220° the solid hydro-chloride prepared from French turpentine, with potassium stearate or dry soap. It melts at 45°, and boils at 160°.

těr'-ě-chrŷs'-ic, a. [Eng. tere(bic); chrys(in), and suff. -ic.] Pertaining to or containing terebic acid and chrysin.

terechrysic-acid, s.

Chem.: $C_6H_5O_5$. An acid, said to be obtained, together with oxalic, terephthalic, and terebic acids, in the watery liquid obtained by oxidizing oil of turpentine with nitric acid diluted with an equal bulk of water. (Watts.)

těr'-ě-dī'-nā, s. [Lat. teredo (q. v.).]

Zoöl. & Palæont.: A sub-genus of Teredo. The valves have an accessory valve in front of the umbones, the aperture of the tube is sometimes shaped like an hour-glass, or six-lobed.

těr'-ě-dīne, s. [Fr., from Mod. Lat. teredina (Larousse).] A doubtful word, usually defined as =the teredo; but possibly formed erroneously from the Lat. teredines (pl. of teredo), which occurs in Adams:

"A better piece of timber hath the more teredines breeding in it."—Works, i. 505.

těr'-ě-dō, s. [Lat., from Gr. terēdōn, from tereō=to bore, to pierce.]

1. Bot.: Any disease in plants produced by the boring of insects.

2. Zoöl. & Palæont.: A genus of Pholadidæ. Worm-like Mollusks, having a sucker-like foot with a foliaceous border, and long, cord-like gills; shell globular, open in front and behind, lodged at the inner extremity of a burrow, in whole or in part lined with shell; valves three-lobed, concentrically striated. Known species; recent, twenty-one, from Britain, Norway, the Black Sea, and the tropics, to 119 fathoms deep. Teredo navalis, the Ship worm, is a soft, cylindrical, somewhat vermiform mollusk, two or two and a half feet long, with two small shells at its anterior extremity. It bores into timber, and is exceedingly destructive to ships. In 1731 and 1732 it created alarm in Holland by boring into the piles constituting part of the defense of the country against the inroads of the sea. Though teak is not so easily attacked as many other kinds of timber, yet it does not wholly escape. The best protection against the teredo is metal sheathing and broad-headed iron nails hammered into the wood. Fossil species twenty-four, from the Lias onward. Used also of any individual of the genus.

te-rēn'-īte, s. [Gr. terēn=friable; suff. -ite.]

Mineralogy:

1. A mineral occurring in crystals with the form of scapolite, also massive. Not analyzed, but stated to be probably a variety of scapolite. Found in a small vein in limestone at Antwerp, New York.

2. A name given by D'Aubisson to certain friable clay-slates or shales, notably those of the carboniferous formation.

těr'-ěph-thāl'-ā-mīde, subst. [English tere(bic); phthal(ic), and amide.]

Chem.: $C_8H_8N_2O_2 = N_2H_4(C_6H_4O_2)''$. Terephthalic amide. An insoluble, white, amorphous body, produced by the action of ammonia on terephthalic chloride.

těr'-ěph-thāl'-ic, adj. [English tere(bic), and phthalic.] Derived from or containing terebic and phthalic acids.

terephthalic-acid, s.

Chem.: $C_8H_6O_4 = C_6H_4(CO_2H)_2$. Insolinic acid. A dibasic acid produced by the action of strong aqueous potash at the boiling heat on phenylene cyanide. It forms a white, tasteless, crystalline powder, nearly insoluble in water, alcohol, and ether, and sublimes without previous fusion at about 300°.

terephthalic-amide, s. [TEREPHTHAL-AMIDE.]

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāl, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camēl, hēr, thēre; pīne, pīt, sīre, sīr, marīne; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unīte, cūr, rūle, fūll; trŷ, Sŷrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

terephthalic-chloride, s.

Chem.: $C_8H_4O_2Cl_2$. Produced by the action of phosphoric pentachloride on terephthalic acid. It forms beautiful crystals, smells like benzoic chloride, and resembles it in all its reactions.

tēr'-ēs, a. [Latin=round, smooth.] Round, cylindrical; used substantively in anatomy as a name for certain muscles and ligaments on account of their shape, as teres major, teres minor, &c.

Tě-rě-ši-an, s. [See def.]

Church Hist.: A member of the Discalced Carmelites of either sex, living under the reformed rule introduced by St. Teresa in the latter half of the sixteenth century.

tēr'-ēt, a. [TERETE.]

tēr'-ēte, *tēr'-ē-toūs, *tēr'-ēt, a. [Lat. teres (genit. teretis)=round, smooth, from tero, to rub.] Cylindrical and smooth; long and round; columnar, as some stems of plants. Opposed to angular (q. v.).

"To the stars nature hath given no such instruments, but made them round and teret like a globe."—Fotherby: Atheomastix, p. 326.

tēr'-ē-tīsm, s. [Gr. teretisma=the chirping of swallows.] Rough and unmelodious noise. (Hall: Satires, IV. i. 3.)

tēr'-gal, a. [Lat. tergum]=the back; English adj. suff. -al.] Of or pertaining to the back; dorsal.

tēr'-gant, tēr'-gi-ant, adj. [Lat. tergum=the back.]

Heraldry: Showing the back part; as, an eagle tergant displayed.

tēr'-gēm'-in-al, tēr'-gēm'-in-ate, a. [TERGEMINOUS.] Thrice double; specif., in botany, three-paired; the term used when each of two secondary petioles bears toward its summit one pair of leaflets, and the common petiole bears a third pair at the origin of the two secondary petioles, as in Mimosa tergemina. (Mirbel.)

tēr'-gēm'-in-oūs, a. [Lat. tergeminus, from ter=thrice, and geminus=twin, double.] Thrice double, three-paired, tergeminate.

tēr'-gīf'-ēr-oūs, a. [Lat. tergum=the back, and fero=to bear.] Bearing or carrying on the back; as tergiferous plants, such as bear their seeds on the backs of their leaves, as ferns; dorsiferous.

tēr'-gīv'-ēr-sāte, v. i. [Lat. tergiversatus, pa. par. of tergiversor=to turn one's back. to reverse, to shuffle: tergum=the back, and versor=to turn one's self about; versus, pa. par. of verto=to turn.] To shift, to shuffle; to practice evasion, shifts, or subterfuges.

"Who also if he were conscious that his assentum to the Platonic theology were not so defensible a thing, doth himself sometime as it were tergiversate and decline it by equivocating in the word Henades."—Cudworth: Intell. Syst., p. 569.

tēr'-gīv'-ēr-sā-tion, s. [Fr. tergiversation, from Lat. tergiversationem, accus. of tergiversatio, from tergiversatus, pa. par. of tergiversor=to tergiversate (q. v.).]

1. The act of tergiversating; a shifting or shuffling; a shift, an evasion, a subterfuge.

"But that no suspicion of tergiversation may be fastened upon me, I am content to deal with you a little, at your own weapons."—Chillingworth: Relig. of Protestants, pt. i., ch. v., § 85.

2. The act of changing or of turning one's back on one's opinions; the act of turning back on a cause formerly advocated; the act of a turncoat.

tēr'-gīv'-ēr-sā-tōr, s. [Lat.] One who practices tergiversation.

tēr'-gī-vēr-se, v. i. [Latin tergiversor=to tergiversate (q. v.).] To turn one's back.

"The Briton never tergivers'd

But was for adverse drubbing."

Saint George for England, pt. ii.

tēr'-gūm, s. [Lat.=the back.]

1. Entom.: The upper surface of the abdomen in insects.

2. Zool.: The dorsal arc of the somite of an arthropod, as of a Crustacean or an Arachnid.

tēr'-in, s. [Fr. tarin.] A kind of singing bird; the siskin. [TARIN.]

tērm, *tearm, *tearme, *terme, s. [Fr. terme=term, time, or day, a word, from Lat. terminum, accus. of terminus=a boundary-line, a bound, a limit (whence terminal, terminate, terminus); cf. Gr. terma=a limit; O. Lat. termin; Sp. termino; Ital. termine, termino.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The extremity of anything; a limit, a bound, a boundary.

"Corruption is a reciprocal to generation; and they two are as nature's two terms or boundaries, and the guides to life and death."—Bacon: Natural History.

2. The time or period during which anything lasts; any limited time; a time or period fixed in any way.

"Doomed for a certain term to walk the night."

Shakesp.: Hamlet, i. 5.

3. In universities, colleges, and schools, the period during which instruction is regularly given to students.

"They will have something to think and talk about during their next term at school."—Field, Jan. 23, 1886.

4. The time during which the law-courts are held or are open for the trial of causes; as, January term, October term, &c.

"They [lawyers] sleep between term and term."

Shakesp.: As You Like It, iii. 2.

5. A word by which something fixed or definite is expressed or designated; a word having a definite and specific meaning, and naming or characterizing some particular person, thing, act, quality, or the like; especially, a word having a technical meaning; as, technical terms, scientific terms, &c.

"Of your juggling terme penance I can not affirm."—Tyndall: Works, p. 320.

6. (Pl.): Language or words generally.

"As you would say in plain terms."

Shakesp.: Merchant of Venice, ii. 2.

7. (Pl.): Conditions; stipulations; propositions stated and offered for acceptance.

"If we can make our peace

Upon such large terms and so absolute."

Shakesp.: Henry IV., Pt. II., iv. 1.

¶ Hence used for charge, rate of payment; as, What are your terms for singing lessons?

†8. (Pl.): State; situation; circumstances.

"The terms of our estate may not endure Hazards so dangerous."

Shakesp.: Hamlet, iii. 5.

9. (Pl.): Relative position; relation; footing; position.

"The Ambassadors must therefore try to be on good terms with those who were out as well as with those who were in."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xiii.

II. Technically:

1. Arch.: A pedestal widening toward the top, where it merges into a bust; a terminal figure. [TERMINUS.]

2. Alg.: A member of a compound quantity; as, a in $a + b$, ab in $ab + cd$; a single expression connected with any other by the signs plus or minus.

3. Geom.: The extreme of any magnitude, or that which limits or bounds its extent; thus, the terms of a line are points; the terms of a superficies, lines, &c.

4. Law:

(1) An estate or interest in land to be enjoyed for a fixed period; the period itself; more fully called a term of years, a term for years.

(2) A day on which rent or interest is payable, commonly called quarter-days (q. v.). In this country houses are let from May 1st for a year or a period of years.

(3) A certain time fixed by authority of a court within which a party is allowed to establish his averment by evidence.

5. Logic: The subject or predicate of a proposition; one of the three component parts of a syllogism, each of which is used twice. Terms are divided into simple, singular, universal, common, univocal, equivocal, analogous, abstract, concrete, &c. The predicate of the conclusion of a syllogism is called the major term, because it is the most general; the subject of the conclusion is called the minor term, as being less general. These are called the extremes, and the third term introduced as a common measure between them is called the mean or middle term. [SYLLOGISM.]

6. Med. (pl.): The monthly uterine secretions of women.

7. Shipbuild.: The same as TERM-PIECE (q. v.).

¶ (1) Terms of an equation:

Alg.: The several parts of which it is composed connected by the signs + or -. Thus, $x^3 - 6x^2 + 11x - 6 = 0$ is an equation composed of four terms.

(2) Terms of a fraction:

Math.: The numerator and denominator of the fraction.

(3) Terms of a proportion (or progression):

Math.: The several separate quantities of which the proportion (or progression) consists.

(4) Terms of a ratio:

Math.: The antecedent and consequent of the ratio.

(5) To be under terms:

Law: To be under conditions on which indulgence is granted by the Court, as, to plead issuably. (Wharton.)

(6) To bring to terms: To reduce to submission or to conditions.

(7) To come to terms: To agree; to come to an agreement.

(8) To make terms: To come to an agreement.

term-fee, s.

Law: A fee or certain sum charged to a suitor for each term his cause is in court.

term-piece, s.

Shipbuild.: A piece of carved work placed under each end of the taffrail of a ship, at the side timbers of the stern, and extended down as low as the foot-rail of the balcony.

tērm, *tearme, v. t. [TERM, s.] To name, to call, to denominate, to express.

"As maister Gersonne in the Latin tong termeth it."—Sir T. More: Works, p. 1,376.

tēr'-ma-gan-çy, s. [English termagan(t); -cy.] The quality or state of being a termagant; turbulence, violence.

"By violent termagancy of temper, she may never suffer him to have a moment's peace."—Barker.

tēr'-ma-gant, *ter-ma-gaunt, a. & s. [From Termagant, the name of one of the idols whom the Saracens are represented in mediæval romances as worshipping. He was afterward introduced into the old Moralities as a person of violent temper, so that a ranting actor might appear to advantage in that character (Shakesp.: Hamlet, iii. 2). It is a corrupt. of O. Fr. Tervagant, Tervagan, or Tarvagan, used for a Saracen idol, from Ital. Trivagante, Trivigante, prob.=the moon, as wandering under the three names of Selene (or Luna) in heaven, Artemis (or Diana) on earth, and Persephone (or Proserpine) in the lower world; from Lat. ter=thrice, and vagans, pr. par. of vagor=to wander.]

A. As adj.: Violent, quarrelsome, boisterous, turbulent.

"'Twas time to counterfeit, or that hot termagant Scot had paid me scot and lot too."—Shakesp.: Henry IV., Pt. I., v. 4.

B. As substantive:

1. The name given by the writers of mediæval romances to a fabled Saracen idol. (See etym.)

"Nor fright the reader with the Pagan vaunt

Of mighty Mahound, and great Termagant."

Bp. Hall: Satires, i. 1.

*2. A turbulent, brawling, scolding, or abusive person. (Originally applied to men rather than women.)

"Thou delightest to play the tyrant and termagant among them."—Rogers: Naaman the Syrian, p. 270.

3. A boisterous, abusive, scolding, or violent woman; a shrew, a virago.

"An imperious and reckless termagant."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xv.

tēr'-ma-gant-ly, adv. [Eng. termagant; -ly.] In a termagant or abusive manner; like a termagant; extravagantly, outrageously.

"A nose so termagantly rubicund."—T. Brown: Works, i. 143.

tērm'-ēr, *tearm-er, s. [Eng. term, s.; -er.]

*1. One who traveled up to attend English court terms; one who resorted to London in term-time only for the sake of tricks to be practiced or intrigues to be carried on at that period, the law terms being formerly the great times of resort to London, not only for business but for pleasure. (Nares.)

2. One who terms or names.

3. The same as TERMOR (q. v.).

tēr'-mēs (pl. tēr'-mī-tēs), subst. [Latin termes (genit. termitis)=a wood-worm. Cf. also termes=the branch of a tree, a bough cut from a tree.]

1. Entom.: White ant, the typical genus of Termitidæ (q. v.). The antennæ are as long as the head and thorax, inserted in front of the eyes, and composed of about eighteen joints. [TERMITIDÆ.]

2. Palæont.: A species occurs in the Purbeck beds.

tēr'-mīn-a-ble, a. [As if from a Lat. terminabilis, from termino=to terminate (q. v.).] Capable of being terminated; limitable; terminating after a certain period.

"The terminable pains of a part of hell."—Taylor: Dissuasive from Popery, pt. i., § 4.

tēr'-mīn-a-ble-nēss, subst. [Eng. terminable; -ness.] The quality or state of being terminable.

tēr'-mīn-al, a. & s. [Lat. terminalis, from terminus=a boundary-line, a limit, a bound; Fr., Sp. Port. terminal; Ital. terminale.]

A. As adjective:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Pertaining or relating to a boundary, limit, or limitation; pertaining to or forming a limit or extremity.

bōil, bōy; pōut, jōwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, aș; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f. -cian, -tian = șan. -tion, -sion = șun; -țion, -șion = zhun. -tious, -cious, -sious = șus. -ble, -dle, &c. = bəl, dəl.

2. Of or pertaining to the terminus of a railway; charged at a terminus.

"They object, in the first place, to the legalization of terminal charges for the cost of providing stations and warehouses."—London Morning Post.

II. Technically:

1. Botany: Proceeding from the end; ending, bounding.

2. Geom.: Forming an edge or extremity. Thus we speak of the terminal edge of a polyhedron, and sometimes of the terminal faces of a solid. Terminal is nearly synonymous with limiting.

3. Logic: Constituted by or relating to a term.

B. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. That which terminates; a bound, a limit, an extremity, an end.

2. A terminal charge; a charge made for the use of termini or stations on a railway.

"On the vexed question of terminals the railway companies take a very firm stand."—London Morning Post.

II. Electro-magn.: The clamping-screw at each end of a voltaic battery, used for connecting it with the wires which complete the circuit. One terminal is at the copper or negative pole, and the other at the zinc or positive pole. Their connection by wire starts the battery into action.

terminal-bud, s.

Bot.: A bud situated at the end of a branch.

terminal-figure, s. The same as TERMINUS, II. 2.

terminal-form, s. [TERMINAL-VALUE.]

terminal-style, s.

Bot.: A style placed at the summit of the ovary.

terminal-value, terminal-form, s.

Math.: The last and most complete value or form given to an expression.

terminal-velocity, s. In the theory of projectiles, the greatest velocity which a body can acquire by falling freely through the air, the limit being arrived at when the increase of the atmospheric resistance becomes equal to the increase of the force of gravity.

tēr-mīn-ā-lē-æ, s. pl. [From Mod. Lat. terminalia, 2.]

Bot.: A tribe of Combretaceæ, having the corolla generally wanting and the cotyledons convolute.

tēr-mīn-ā-lī-a, s. pl. [Lat., neut. pl. of terminalis=pertaining or relating to a boundary or limit.] [TERMINUS.]

1. Roman Antiq.: A festival celebrated annually on the 23d of February in honor of Terminus, the god of boundaries. It was then usual for peasants to assemble near the principal landmarks which separated their fields, and, after they had crowned them with garlands and flowers, to make libations of milk and wine, and to sacrifice a lamb or a young pig. The public festival was celebrated at the sixth milestone on the road to Laurentum, because at one time that was the limit of Roman territory. [TERMINUS, II. 1.]

2. Bot. (as a pseudo-singular): The typical genus of Terminaliæ (q. v.). Trees and shrubs with alternate leaves, usually crowded at the end of the branches. Inflorescence in racemose and panicle spikes, generally hermaphrodite in their lower part, and only stamiferous above; calyx campanulate, five-cleft, the lobes acute; corolla wanting; stamens ten; ovary with two ovules; drupe with but one seed. From the tropics of Asia and America. Terminalia chebula is a large and valuable tree, eighty to a hundred feet high, growing in India and Burmah. The fruit is ellipsoid or obovoid and five-ribbed, from three-quarters of an inch to an inch and a quarter in length. The pounded rind gives the black myrobalan (q. v.). The bark of the tree is used for tanning and dyeing. There are often galls upon it, which are also used for dyeing. Another of the Myrobalans is T. belerica, sixty or eighty feet high. It grows in India. The leaves and the fruit are used for tanning and dyeing. Other Indian species said to be used for tanning and dyeing are T. arjuna, T. catappa, T. citrina, T. paniculata, and T. tomentosa. The fruits of T. catappa, sometimes called the Almond, are eaten; so are the kernels of T. chebula, which, however, if taken in large quantities, produce intoxication. A gum like gum arabic is exuded from its bark. T. chebula was believed by the old Hindus to be alterative and tonic. The fruits of T. belerica are astringent and laxative; the other Indian species are also medicinal. The milky juice of T. benzoin becomes fragrant on being dried. It is burnt in churches in Mauritius as a kind of incense. A drastic resin flows from T. argentea, a Brazilian species. The root of T. latifolia is given in Jamaica in diarrhoea. The bark of T. alata is astringent and antifebrile. The wood of T. tomentosa, when polished, resembles walnut, and has been used in India for making stethoscopes.

tēr'-mīn-ant, s. [Latin terminans, pr. par. of termino=to terminate (q. v.).] Termination, ending.

tēr-mīt'-ī-dæ, subst. pl. [Latin termes, genit. termit(is); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Entom.: White Ants; a family of Pseudoneuroptera, tribe Sodalina. The mature males and females have the antennæ with thirteen to twenty beaded joints, the compound eyes rounded; ocelli two; the head projecting in front of the prothorax; three segments of the thorax nearly equal in size; abdomen of nine distinct segments, terminating in very minute, two-jointed spiral styles; legs simple; tarsi four-jointed; wings membranous, falling off after the nuptial flight. Besides the mature males and females, two other kinds of Termites exist, "soldiers" and "workers." The soldiers have a large, square head, with projecting mandibles, and the workers a small, rounded head, with concealed mandibles. Both are destitute of eyes, and are modified larvæ. The adult males and females, when they have just reached maturity, swarm into the air, descending again after a short flight, losing their wings, and becoming the kings and queens of future termitaries. Sexual congress takes place after they have returned to the earth. The abdomen of the queen becomes of extraordinary magnitude, so that the head and thorax seem like a small excrescence on it; she is said to lay 80,000 eggs a day during her life, which lasts for about a year. The Termitidæ exist chiefly in tropical and sub-tropical countries, where they are very destructive. Sparmann described five South African species of Termes, T. bellicosus, T. mordax, T. atrox, T. destructor, and T. arborum. T. bellicosus builds nests of clay ten or twelve feet high, of conical form, and, when covered with vegetation, strong enough to support men and animals. T. atrox and T. mordax construct nests of a cylindrical form, with a conical roof. T. arborum builds a spherical nest in trees; some are small, others the size of a hoghead. They are constructed of bits of wood, cemented with gums and juices of trees. Other species are common in the East and West Indies. Three small species are now European, viz., T. lucifugus, abundant in some parts of France; T. flavicollis, introduced into the south of France and Portugal from Northern Africa, and T. flavipes, introduced apparently from South America. T. lucifugus infests the trunks of pines and oaks, posts, piers, &c. It has been found very destructive in some localities.

tēr-mī-tīd'-ī-ūm, s. [Lat. termes (genit. termitis), and Gr. eidos=form.]

Palæont.: A genus of Neuroptera, akin to Termes.
tēr-mī-tī-næ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. termes, genit. termit(is); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -inæ.]

Entom.: A section of Neuropterous Insects, in which Latreille included Mantispæ, Raphidia, Termes, and Psocus.

tērm'-lēss, terme-lesse, a. [Eng. term, s.; -less.]
1. Having no term or limit; unlimited, endless, boundless.

"These betraying lights look not up toward termless joys, nor down toward endless sorrows."—Raleigh.

2. Inexpressible, indescribable.

"His phoenix down began but to appear,
Like unshorn velvet, on that termless skin."
Shakesp.: Lover's Complaint, 94.

tērm'-lŷ, a. & adv. [Eng. term, s.; -ly.]

A. As adj.: Occurring or recurring every term.

"The clerks are partly awarded by that mean also [petty fees] for their entries, discharges and some other writings, besides that termly fee which they are allowed."
—Bacon: Office of Alienations.

B. As adv.: Term by term; every term.

"The fees or allowances, that are termly given to these deputies, receivers, and clerks, for recompense of these their pains, I do purposely pretermitt; because they be not certain, but arbitrary."—Bacon: Office of Alienations.

tēr-mōn-ōl'-ō-gŷ, s. [TERMINOLOGY.]

tērm'-or, s. [Eng. term, s.; -or.]

Eng. Law: One who has an estate for a term of years or for life.

"When by the statute 21 Hen. VIII., c. 15, the termor (that is, he who is entitled to the term of years) was protected against these fictitious recoveries, and his interest rendered secure and permanent, long terms began to be more frequent than before."—Blackstone: Comment., bk. ii., ch. 9.

tērn, subst. [Dan. terne, tærne; Sw. tärna; Icel. terna=a tern.] [STERNA.]

Ornith.: The popular name of any species of the genus Sterna (q. v.). They are slenderly built birds, with long, narrow, sharp-pointed wings, and forked tail, from which, as well as from their swift and circling manner of flight, they are often called Sea-swallows. The thick, soft, close plumage is colored light blue, black, and white, varying but little with sex, age, or season of the year. They are extensively distributed, inhabiting every zone, but prefer warm and temperate climates to the colder regions, which they only visit for a short period during the year. All are exceedingly active, and from sunrise to sunset are upon the wing, generally flying very near the surface of the water, rising and sinking as the waves heave and fall. They walk badly, and are not good swimmers, their small feet rendering them but little assistance, so that they are tossed about like corks. They feed on small fish and marine animals, always taking their prey on the wing.

tērn, a. & s. [Lat. terni=three each, from tres=three, ter=thrice.]

A. As adj.: Threefold; consisting of three. (Used chiefly in botany.)

B. As subst.: That which consists of three things or numbers together; specif., a prize in a lottery gained by drawing three favorable numbers; the numbers themselves.

tern-flowers, s. pl.

Bot.: Flowers growing in threes.

tern-leaves, s. pl.

Bot.: Leaves arranged three in a whorl.

tern-peduncles, s. pl.

Bot.: Peduncles growing three together from the same axis.

tēr-na-rŷ, a. & s. [Lat. ternarius, from terni=three each; Fr. ternaire.] [TERN, a.]

1. The extent or compass of land within the jurisdiction or bounds of a particular sovereign state or other body; any separate tract of country as belonging to a state; dominion. Sometimes applied to a domain or tract of land belonging to a private individual.

2. Any large tract of land; a region, a country; as, an unexplored territory.

3. A portion of the country not included within the limits of any state, and not yet admitted as a state into the Union, but organized with a separate legislature, under a territorial government and other officers appointed by the President and Senate of the United States. (Goodrich.)

¶ Both territory and dominion respect a portion of country under a particular government; but the word territory brings to our minds the land which is included; dominion conveys to our minds the power which is exercised; the territory speaks of that which is in its nature bounded; the dominions may be said of that which is boundless. A petty prince has his territory; the monarch of a great empire has dominions. It is the object of every ruler to guard his territory against the irruptions of an enemy; ambitious rulers are always aiming to extend their dominions.

¶ Territory of a judge:

Law: The district over which his jurisdiction extends in causes and in judicial acts proper to him, and beyond which he has no judicial authority.

těr-rō-, pref. [Lat. terra = the earth.] (See compound.)

terro-metal, terro-metallic, s. A composition of several clays, possessing, when baked, peculiar hardness. It is principally used for making tiles.

těr-rōr, těr-rōur, s. [Fr. terreur, from Lat. terrorem, accus. of terror = dread, terror; terreo = to be afraid, to tremble; cf. Sansc. tras = to tremble, to be afraid; trása = terror; Sp. & Port. terror; Ital. terrore.]

1. Fear which extremely agitates the body and mind; extreme fear, alarm, or dread; fright.

"Terror is that species of fear which rouses to defend or escape; producing the violent agitations which have been already noticed."—Cogan: On the Passions, ch. ii., §3.

2. That which excites or may excite dread; a cause of fear or alarm.

"Rulers are not a terror to good works, but to the evil."—Romans xiii. 3.

¶ Darwin (Descent of Man, ch. iii.) shows that terror acts on the lower animals in the same way as on man, causing the muscles to tremble, the heart to palpitate, the sphincters to be relaxed, and the hair to stand on end.

¶ (1) King of terrors: Death.

"His confidence shall be rooted out of his tabernacle, and it shall bring him to the king of terrors."—Job xviii. 14.

(2) Reign of terror: [REIGN, s., ¶.]

terror-breathing, a. Inspiring terror; terrifying.

"For which Rome sends her curses out from far, Through the stern throat of terror-breathing war."

Drayton: Mortimer to Queen Isabel.

terror-haunted, a. Haunted with terrifying objects or appearances.

"Till at length the lays they chaunted Reached the chamber terror-haunted."

Longfellow: Norman Baron.

terror-smitten, a. Struck or affected with terror; terrified, terror-struck.

terror-stirring, a. Inspiring terror; terrifying.

"Then all the Greeks ran in to him,
To see his person; and admir'd his terror-stirring lim."

Chapman: Homer's Iliad, xxii.

terror-stricken, terror-struck, a. Struck with terror; terrified.

těr-rōr-ĩsm, s. [Eng. terror; -ism.] The act of one who terrorizes; the act of terrorizing; a system of government by terror; the practice of using intimidation to coerce people to a certain course; intimidation.

"Throughout Cork, Kerry . . . this terrorism prevails."—London Daily Chronicle.

těr-rōr-ĩst, s. [Eng. terror; -ist.] One who terrorizes; one who rules by intimidation; one who advocates, recommends, or practices terrorism; specifically, an agent or partisan of the revolutionary tribunal during the reign of terror in France.

"Like the Terrorists of '93, who, having begun by beheading princes and nobles, ended by sending artisans and shopgirls to the guillotine."—London Daily Telegraph.

těr-rōr-ize, v. t. [Eng. terror; -ize.] To impress with terror or fear; to sway or impel by terror; to force by intimidation to a certain course.

"Ministers, we feel sure, will neither be terrorized nor cajoled into offering any measure affecting either the land or local government."—London Daily Telegraph.

těr-rōr-lěss, a. [Eng. terror; -less.]

1. Free from terror.

2. Unalarming; without the will or ability to inspire terror.

těr-rỹ, s. [Fr. tirer = to draw.]

1. Rope-making: An open reel.

2. Fabric: A pile fabric, such as plush or velvet; probably from the drawing out of the wires over which the warp is laid to make the series of loops seen in Brussels carpet or uncut velvet.

"Silk guipure with terry or sheeny silk."—London Daily Telegraph.

terry-velvet, s. A silk plush, or ribbed velvet.

těrsē, a. [Lat. tersus, prop. pa. par. of tergo = to wipe, to rub off, to polish.]

*I. Lit.: Wiped or rubbed; appearing wiped or rubbed; polished, smooth.

"Many stones precious and vulgar, although terse and smooth, have not this power attractive."—Browne: Vulgar Errors.

II. Figuratively:

*1. Refined, accomplished, polished. (Said of persons.)

2. Free from superfluities; neatly or elegantly concise; neat and concise.

"His despatches, which are still extant, and which are models of official writing, terse, perspicuous, full of important facts and weighty reasons, compressed into the smallest possible number of words."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xiv.

těrsē-lỹ, terce-ly, adv. [Eng. terse; -ly.] In a terse manner; neatly and concisely, succinctly and elegantly.

"Understand him not, that one so infirm with age, or decrepid in years, but that one living in so ignorant and superstitious a generation, could write so tercely."—Fuller: Worthies; Lincolnshire.

těrsē-něss, s. [Eng. terse; -ness.]

*1. Lit.: Smoothness.

"The cylindrical figure of the mole, as well as the compactness of its form, arising from the terseness of its limbs, proportionally lessens its labor."—Paley: Natural Theology, ch. xv.

2. The quality or state of being terse; neatness or conciseness of style; brevity combined with elegance.

"That is an American locution, but it is expressive with tolerable terseness of the general aspect of the river Yarra Yarra."—London Daily Telegraph.

těr-tĩ-əl (ti as sh), a. & s. [Lat. tertius = third, from tres = three.]

Ornithology:

A. As adj.: Of or belonging to the tertiaries.

B. As subst.: One of the tertiary feathers; a tertiary (q. v.).

těr-tĩ-ən (ti as sh), ter-tiane, ter-cian, a. & s. [Fr. tertiane = a tertian ague, from Lat. tertiana = a tertian fever; prop. fem. sing. of tertianus = tertian, belonging to the third; tertius = third; tres = three.]

A. As adj.: Occurring or recurring every third day.

"A tertian ague is at least your lot."

Dryden: Cock and Fox, 182.

B. As substantive:

1. A fever or other disease whose paroxysms recur every other day; an intermittent fever, &c., whose paroxysms occur after intervals of about forty-eight hours.

*2. A measure of eighty-four gallons, the third part of a tun.

3. A curve of the third degree.

tertian-ague, s. [AGUE, II. 1.]

těr-tĩ-a-rỹ (ti as shĩ), a. & s. [Lat. tertianus = prop. containing a third part, now considered as meaning, belonging to the third.]

A. As adjective:

1. Ord. Lang.: Of the third order, rank, or formation; third.

2. Eccles.: Of, belonging to, or connected with a Third Order (q. v.).

"Thus arose various congregations of tertiary monks and nuns—in Lombardy, Sicily, Dalmatia, France, Spain, and Portugal."—Addis & Arnold: Cath. Dict., p. 792.

B. As substantive:

I. Ord. Lang.: That which is tertiary or third in order, succession, or formation.

II. Technically:

1. Art: A color, as citrine, russet, or olive, produced by the mixture of two secondary colors.

bōil, bōy; pōut, jōwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, ðhis; sin, aș; expect, Xēnophon, exĩst. ph = f. -cian, -tian = șan. -tion, -sion = șũn; -țion, -șion = zhũn. -tious, -cious, -sious = șũș. -ble, -dle, &c. = bēl, dēl.

More correctly speaking, they are grays, and are either red-gray, blue-gray, or yellow-gray, when these primaries are in excess, or they are violet-gray, orange-gray, or green-gray, when these secondaries are in excess.

2. Eccles.: A member of a Third Order (q. v.), whether living in the world or in community.

"Many tertiaries, in course of time . . . desired to take solemn vows."—Addis & Arnold: Cath. Dict., p. 792.

3. Geology:

(1) Of strata.: The third leading division of fossiliferous sedimentary rocks. Called also the Cainozoic or Kainozoic. The succession and importance of the Primary (Palæozoic) and the secondary (Mesozoic) rocks were understood before the nature and extent of the Tertiary were recognized, these last strata being confounded with the superficial alluviums. [SUPRACRETACEOUS.] They were observed to occur in patches (some of fresh water and others of marine origin) in small areas or basins in the Secondary rocks, suggesting the idea that they had been deposited in bays, lakes, estuaries, or inland seas, after a great part of what is now Europe had been converted into dry land. The first properly understood strata of Tertiary age were those in the vicinity of Paris, described by Cuvier and Brongniart in 1810. Other Tertiary strata were shortly afterward discriminated in England, in London, in Hampshire, in Suffolk, in the Subappennine hills in Italy, near Bordeaux and Dax in the South of France, and elsewhere. These several deposits were found to be not quite contemporaneous, and there arose a division, which continued till 1833, into the Lower, Middle, and Upper Tertiary. But as early as 1828, Mr. (afterward Sir Charles) Lyell had conceived the idea that the Tertiary strata might be classified by the percentage of extinct species of shells which they contained. He found, in 1829, that Deshayes, of Paris, had independently come to the same conclusion, and the latter geologist, after comparing 3,000 fossil with 5,000 living shells, intimated that in the Lower Tertiary strata about 3½ per cent. of the species were identical with recent ones; in the Middle Tertiary about 17 per cent.; in the Upper Tertiary, in the oldest beds 35-50, and in the more modern ones 90-95 per cent. To these three Lyell gave the names Eocene, Miocene, and Pliocene respectively, words which have since gained universal currency. The foregoing percentages are now known to be only approximately accurate. Next the newer Pliocene beds were called by Lyell Pleistocene (q. v.), a name afterward transferred to the Post Tertiary, and Oligocene (q. v.) was proposed by Beyrich for beds intercalated between the Eocene and the Miocene. A gap, as yet only partially filled, occurs between the Chalk and the Eocene. This gap has been utilized to draw a natural line between the Secondary and the Tertiary beds. It probably arose from an upheaval of the sea-bed. Thus, with the Eocene, as the name imports, the dawn of the present system of things began, and the percentage of shell-species shows that the transition has gone on without stoppage or hiatus till now. [QUATERNARY, RECENT.] Other classes present evidence of the same kind; but, as Lyell was the first to point out, which he did in 1830, Shell species have a longevity far exceeding that of the Mammalia. No recent mammal appears in the Eocene, though in Eocene strata various mammalian families which have well-known living representatives appear for the first time. Among animals the Tertiary is the age of Mammals; among plants it is the age of Dicotyledons, the Cycads and Conifers of the Upper Secondary rocks having given place to plants belonging to many orders and a vegetation only less varied than now. [For Tertiary volcanic rocks, see VOLCANIC.] Murchison says that gold is generally wanting in the Tertiary.

(2) Of time.: The period of time during which the Tertiary strata were deposited. It cannot yet be measured even approximately. When it commenced, England, as proved by the fruits in the London Clay at Sheppey, was a tropical or subtropical country. The temperature fell till the Newer Pliocene, by which time the climate was semi-arctic. [GLACIAL-PERIOD.] During the deposition of the Tertiary, there was a great increase of land both in Europe and America.

4. Ornith. (pl.): The tertials; wing-feathers having their origin from the humerus. They are a portion of the quills. They are not scapulars, though Cuvier calls them by this name; nor do they cover the scapulars. Their use is to fill up the interval between the body and the expanded wing, and to oppose a broader surface of resistance to the air.

tertiary-alcohols, s. pl.

Chem.: Alcohols in which hydroxyl is united to a carbon atom, which is united to three other carbon atoms.

tertiary-colors, s. pl.

Art.: Colors produced by the mixture of two secondary colors, as citrine, russet, or olive. [TERTIARY, B. II.1.]

tertiary era, epoch, or period, s. [TERTIARY, II. 3.]

tertiary-formation, s. [TERTIARY, II. 3.]

tertiary-syphilis, s.

Pathol.: The name given to symptoms sometimes appearing in syphilis after the primary and secondary maladies have passed away. They are rupia, deep-seated tubercles and ulcers on the skin, destructive ulceration of the soft palate, the pharynx, the tongue, &c., with periostitis, nodosis, caries, and necrosis in the bones, and gummata in various organs.

tër-ti-âte (ti as shī), v. t. [Lat. tertiatum, sup. of tertio=to do the third day; tertius=third.]

*1. To do for the third time.

2. To examine, as the thickness of the metal at the muzzle of a gun; or, in general, to examine the thickness of ordnance, in order to ascertain its strength.

tër-ti-üm quid (ti as shī), phr. [Lat.] A third something in addition to two others, what this something is being left indefinite.

tër-ti-üm sāl (ti as shī), s. [Lat.=third salt.]

Old Chem.: A neutral salt, as being the product of an acid and an alkali, making a third substance different from either.

Tër-tül'-lī-ān-ist, s. [See def.]

Church Hist.: A follower of Tertullian, whose full Latin name was Quintus Septimus Florens Tertullianus. He flourished in the latter end of the second and the beginning of the third century. About the year 200 he became a Montanist. He was at first a rhetorician, but after his conversion was ordained a Presbyter. Whether he returned to the Catholic church is uncertain; but he was held in great veneration till his death. He composed many works, and was the earliest of the Latin ecclesiastical writers. He was a man of high genius, but gloomy and fanatical. A sect calling themselves Tertullianists existed at Carthage in the fifth century, but their connection with the Christian father Tertullian is very obscure.

tër-ün'-çī-ūs, s. [Lat. ter=thrice, and uncia=an ounce.]

Rom. Antiq.: An ancient Roman coin, weighing three ounces, the fourth part of the as.

tër-ū-tê-rō, s. [Native name at Buenos Ayres. Called in Paraguay teten. Both are from the notes of the bird.]

Ornith.: Vanellus cayanensis; the Cayenne Sandpiper of Latham, described by Azara. It is very common in parts of South America. It approaches the European lapwing in its size, its tuft, and in the general tone of its colors; but it stands higher, and is armed with a sp. at the folds of the wing. Its eggs, which are often deposited on the bare ground in October or November, are four or fewer, of a clear olive color marbled with black, and are esteemed a delicacy, like those of the plover in England.

ter-y, a. [TEARY.]

têrz'-a rî-mā (z as ts), s. [Ital.=third or triple rhyme.] A peculiar and complicated system of versification, borrowed by the early Italian poets from the troubadours. It was used by Byron in his Prophecy of Dante.

têrz-êt'-tō (z as ts), s. [Ital.]

Music: A short composition, piece, or movement for three performers.

têsch-ê-mach'-êr-ite, s. [After E. F. Teschemacher, who first announced it; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A native carbonate of ammonia, occurring both in crystals and massive in guano deposits. Crystal system not ascertained. Hardness, 1½; specific gravity, 1.45; color, yellowish to white. Composition: Ammonia, 32.9; carbonic acid, 55.7; water, 11.4=100, yielding the formula ($\frac{1}{2}$ NH₄O+ $\frac{1}{2}$ HO) CO₂.

têsch'-in-ite, têsch'-ên-ite, s. [After Teschin or Teschen, Moravia, where first found; suff. -ite (Petrol.).]

Petrol.: A rock consisting of variable proportions of a plagioclase felspar, fresh nepheline, augite, and hornblende, with some ilmenite and apatite.

Têsh'-ō La'-mā, s. [See def.]

Compar. Relig.: The abbot of the great monastery at Krashis Lunpo; one of the great Lamas, the other being the Dalai Lama, who has the political supremacy. When either dies it is necessary for the other to ascertain in whose body the celestial being whose outward form has been dissolved has been pleased again to incarnate himself. For that purpose the names of all the male children born just after the death of the deceased Grand Lama are laid before his survivor, who chooses three out of the whole number. Their names are inscribed on tablets and put into a casket, whence one is selected by the abbots of the great monasteries to fill the place of the dead Lama. The Tesho Lama is often called Pantshen Rinpotshe (the Glorious Teacher).

tês-quite, s. [Native Indian.] A natural alkaline efflorescence, found around some of the southwestern lakes, &c., of the Union.

tês-sar-a-dêc'-ad, s. [Gr. tessares=four, and deka=ten.] A group of fourteen individuals; an aggregate of fourteen.

tês-sêl-â-tā, s. pl. [Neut. pl. of Lat. tessellatus=tessellated.]

Zool.: A sub-order of Crinoidea, in which the radial plates of the calyx are immovably jointed together without articulation.

tês-sêl-ât-êd, tês-sêl-lât-êd, a. [TESSELLAR.]

1. Ord. Lang.: Formed by inlaying differently colored materials in little squares, triangles, or other geometrical figures, or by mosaic work; especially applied to a pavement composed of square dies or tesserae made of baked clay or stone, generally of various colors, and forming regular figures. It was much employed by the ancients, and Roman remains furnish a large number of these specimens of art. It is still much in vogue in the East, particularly at Damascus.

"A cabinet so variously inlaid; such a piece of diversified mosaic; such a tessellated pavement without cement."—Burke: American Taxation.

2. Bot.: Having the colors arranged in small squares, so as to have some resemblance to a tessellated pavement; variegated by squares; checkered.

tessellated-tile, s. A tile made of clay of a particular color, or mixed with coloring matters and formed into flat cakes by cutting or pressing, and used for making a tessellated pavement.

tês-sêl-â-tion, tês-sêl-lâ-tion, s. [TESSELLATED.]

1. The act, process, or operation of making tessellated work.

2. Tessellated or mosaic work.

tês-sê-lite, s. [Latin tessera=a die, a cube, and Gr. lithos=a stone; Ger. tesselit.]

Min.: A variety of apophyllite (q. v.) occurring in short square prisms resembling cubes, and exhibiting a tessellated structure with polarized light. Found in the Faroe Islands.

tês-sêl-lā, s. [TESSERA.]

tês-sêl-lā, a. [Lat. tessella=a small, square piece of stone, dimin., from tessera=a squared piece, a die.] Formed with tesserae or in squares.

tês-sêr-ā (pl. tês-sêr-æ), s. [Lat.] [TESSELLAR.]

1. A small cubical or other geometrical form of marble, earthenware, ivory, glass, &c., used for tessellated pavements, ornamenting walls, &c.; colored tiles or bricks, usually cubical, laid in patterns, as a mosaic pavement.

*2. A small piece of wood, bone, or metal, used as a ticket of admission to the theaters in ancient Rome, or as a certificate given to gladiators, containing their names, that of the consul, and the day on which they had won their distinction in the circus.

tês-sêr-â-ic, tês-sêr-â-ick, a. [TESSERA.] Diversified by tesserae or squares; tessellated.

"Some of the tesseraick work of the Romans has lately been dug up."—St. R. Atkins: History of Gloucester. (1712.)

tês-sêr-āl, a [Lat. tessera=a square, a dice, a cube.]

1. Ord. Lang.: Pertaining to or containing tesserae; tessellated.

2. Crystall.: Related to the tesseral or cubic system.

tesseral-system, s.

Crystall.: The Cubic-system (q. v.).

tês-sêr-âr'-i-an, a. [Lat. tessera=a die.] Of or pertaining to gambling; as, the tessarian art tês-su-lār, a. [TESSELAR.]

Crystall.: Relating to the cube or having equal axes like the cube; tesseral.

têst (1), teste, s. [O. Fr. test (Fr. têt)=a test; O. Fr. teste=a skull; Fr. tête=a head; Lat. testa=a piece of dried clay, a tile, a brick.]

1. Ordinary Language:

*1. A potsherd.

"Then was the teste or potsherd, the brasse, golde, and syluer redacte into duste."—Joye: Exposition of Daniel, ch. ii.

2. A vessel used in refining gold and silver; a cupel (q. v.).

3. Examination by the cupel; hence, any critical trial and examination; trial.

"Thou hast strangely stood the test."

Shakesp.. Tempest, iv.

4. A means of trial; as, to offer money as a test of one's integrity.

fate, fât, fâro, amidst, whât, fâll, father; wê, wêt, hêre, camel, hêr, thêre; pine, pît, sîre, sîr, marine; gô, pôť, or, wôre, wôlf, wôrk, whô, sôn; mûte, cûb, cûre, unite, cûr, rûle, fûll; trÿ, Sÿrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

*3. Testimony, evidence.

"To vouch this is no proof, Without more wider and more overt test."
Shakesp.: Othello, i. 3.

6. That with which anything is compared for proof of genuineness; a standard.

"At once the source, and end, and test of art."
Pope: Essay on Criticism, 73.

7. Means of discrimination; ground of admission or exclusion.

"Our penal laws no sons of yours admit,
Our test excludes your tribe from benefit."
Dryden: Hind and Panther, iii. 830.

*8. Judgment, discrimination, distinction.

"Who could excel, when few can make a test Betwixt indifferent writing and the best?"
Dryden. (Todd.)

9. An apparatus for proving petroleum and similar hydrocarbon oils by ascertaining the temperature at which they evolve explosive vapors.

II. Technically:

1. Bot.: [TESTA.]

2. Chem.: Any substance employed to bring about a chemical change in a compound, with the view of detecting one or more of its constituents. The change may be one of color, precipitation, heat, evolution of gas, &c. This term is also sometimes applied to examination by the polariscope and blow-pipe, thus, the polariscope-test, the blowpipe-test. [REAGENT.]

3. Metall.: A cupeling-hearth used in a refining-furnace where lead is separated from silver on a large scale. The test is an oval iron frame containing a basin-shaped mass of powdered bone-ash, which is brought to a consistence by a solution of pearlash. The test is fixed as a cupeling-hearth in the reverberatory furnace, and is subjected to a blast from a tuyere, which removes the floating oxide of silver and furnishes oxygen for its elimination from the alloy under treatment.

4. Sugar-man.: The proof or condition of a syrup.

5. Zoölogy:

- (1) The shell of any of the Mollusca.
- (2) The calcareous case of Echinodermata.
- (3) The thick leathery tunic of Tunicata.
- (4) The shell immersed in the sarcode of a Foraminifer.

Test Act, s.

English History:

1. An act passed in 1563 by which an oath of allegiance to Queen Elizabeth, and of abjuration of the temporal authority of the Pope, was exacted from all holders of office, lay or spiritual, within the realm, except peers.

"But the Test Act placed the magistracy in Protestant hands, and, as Elizabeth passed from indifference to suspicion, and from suspicion to terror, she no longer chose to restrain the bigotry around her."—Green: Short History, p. 401.

2. An Act, 2 Car. II., c. 2, passed in 1678, by which it was enacted that all persons holding any important office, civil or military, under the crown, or receiving money therefrom, should take the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, subscribe a declaration against transubstantiation, and receive the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, according to the usage of the Established Church. It was repealed in 1828, by 9 Geo. IV., c. 17.

test-cock, s.

Steam-eng.: A small cock fitted to the top or bottom of a cylinder for clearing it of water.

test-furnace, s.

Metall.: One form of refining furnace for treating argentiferous alloy, such as that of lead rich in silver.

test-glass, s. A glass vessel of conical or cylindrical form, having a foot and sometimes a beak; used for holding chemical solutions.

test-lines, s. pl.

Microscopy: The lines on a test-plate (q. v.). Generally called, from their inventor, Nobert's test-lines.

test-mixer, s. A tall cylindrical bottle having a wide foot and provided with a stopper. It is graduated into 100 or more equal parts, commencing at the bottom, and is used in preparing test-alkalies, test-acids, and similar solutions, by diluting them down to the required strength.

test-object, s.

Microscopy (pl.): Microscopic objects used to determine the value of object glasses; that is, to determine their magnifying, defining, and penetrating power, and their corrective adaptation.

test-paper, s.

1. Chem.: Unsized paper dipped into an alcoholic solution of a vegetable coloring matter, which changes color when exposed to the action of an acid or alkaline solution. [LITMUS-PAPER, TURMERIC-PAPER.]

2. Law: An instrument admitted as a standard of comparison for handwriting. (Amer.) test-plate, s.

1. Chem.: A glass slip used in stirring tests.

2. Microscopy: A finely-ruled glass plate used in testing the power and defining quality of microscopes.

test-pump, subst. A force-pump for testing the strength of boilers, tubes, and other hollow articles by hydraulic pressure. It is provided with a gauge for showing the pressure in pounds applied to the square inch.

test-spoon, s. A small spoon used for taking up small quantities of powders, fluxes, &c. Used in blow-pipe or chemical experiments. The handle may be used as a spatula.

test-stirrer, s. A round glass rod, having one end pointed for dropping tests, and the other end rounded.

test-tube, s.

1. Chem.: A narrow tube from three to six inches in length, closed at one end, made of very thin glass, and furnished with a smooth lip.

2. A chlorometer (q. v.).

*těst (2) s. [Lat. testis=a witness.]

1. A witness.

2. Inspection, oversight, superintendence.

"In his publication he urged the notoriousness of the fact as a thing not feigned, not private, but done at noon day under the test of competent persons."—Bp. Taylor: Rule of Conscience, bk. i., ch. iv.

těst (1), v. t. [TEST (1), s.]

1. Ord. Lang.: To put to the test; to try; to prove the genuineness or truth of by experiment, or by some fixed principle or standard; to compare with a standard.

II. Technically:

1. Chem.: To examine by the application of some reagent.

2. Metall.: To refine as gold or silver, by means of lead, in a test, by the destruction, vitrification, or scorification of all extraneous matter.

těst (2), v. t. & i. [Latin testor=to bear witness, to testify; to attest; testis=a witness.]

A. Trans.: To attest and date; as, a document tested on such and such a day.

B. Intransitive: To make a will or testament. (Scotch.) těs'-tā (pl. těs'-tæ), s. [Latin=a brick, a tile, a shell.]

Bot.: The integuments of a seed, or the outer integument as distinguished from the inner one, or tegmen. Called also the Primine (q. v.).

těst'-a-ble, a. [Lat. testabilis, from testor=to testify, to publish one's will.]

Law:

1. Capable of being devised or given by will.

2. Capable of witnessing or of being witnessed.

†těs'-tā'-čě-a (or č as sh), s. pl. [Neuter pl. of Latin testaceus=covered with a shell, testaceous, from testa=a shell.]

Zoöl.: A term formerly used as approximately equivalent to the more modern Conchifera (q. v.). Linnæus made the Testacea an order of his class Vermes, and Cuvier applied the term to a division of his Acephala (q. v.).

těs'-tā'-čě-aŋ (or čean as shān), a. & s. [TESTACEA.]

A. As adj.: Of or relating to the Testacea.

B. As subst.: Any individual belonging to the Testacea (q. v.).

těs'-tā'-čěl'-lā, s. [Mod. Lat., dimin. from testa (q. v.).]

Zoöl. & Palæont.: A genus of Limacidae (q. v.), with three recent species, from the south of Europe, the Canary Isles, and Britain. Shell small and ear-shaped, placed at hinder extremity of the body, which is elongated, broadest subter, tapering toward the head. The species are subterranean in habit, feeding on earthworms, and visiting the surface only at night. During the winter and in long periods of drought they form a sort of cocoon in the ground by the exudation of mucous; if this be broken away the animal may be seen in its thin, opaque, white mantle, which rapidly contracts till it extends but a little way beyond the margin of the shell. Fossil species two, from Tertiary strata.

těs'-tā'-čě-ōg'-ra-phŭ, těs'-tā'-čě-ōl'-ō-gŭ, s. [Mod. Lat. testacea, and Gr. graphō=to write, or logos=a word, a discourse.] The science of testaceous mollusks; conchology.

těs'-tā'-čě-oŭs (or čeous as shŭs), a. [TESTACEA.]

I. Ord. Lang.: Pertaining to shells; consisting of a hard shell; having a hard continuous shell.

II. Bot. & Entom.: Brownish-yellow, the color of unglazed earthenware.

†testaceous-animals, s. pl.

Zoöl.: Animals with shells typically of a strong kind, as in the oyster, as distinguished from crustaceous shells, which are thinner and articulated, as in the lobster. Spec., the Testacea (q. v.).

těst'-a-čŭ, s. [Eng. testa(te); -cy.]

Law: The state or condition of being testate; or of leaving a valid testament or will at death.

těst'-a-měnt, s. [Fr., from Lat. testamentum=a thing declared, a last will, from testor=to be a witness to, to testify; testis=a witness; Sp., Port. & Ital. testamento.]

1. Law: A solemn authentic instrument in writing, by which a person declares his will as to the disposal of his property after his death; a will (q. v.).

"Every person has full power and liberty to make a will, that is not under some special prohibition by law or custom, which prohibitions are principally upon three accounts: for want of sufficient discretion; for want of sufficient liberty and free will; and on account of their criminal conduct. No testament is of any effect till after the death of the testator; and hence it follows that testaments may be avoided three ways: (1) If made by a person laboring under any of the incapacities before mentioned; (2) by making another testament of a later date; and (3) by canceling or revoking it. For, though I make a last will and testament irrevocable in the strongest words, yet I am at liberty to revoke it; because my own act or words cannot alter the disposition of law, so as to make that irrevocable which is in its own nature revocable; (4) marriage also is an express revocation of a prior will."—Blackstone: Comment., bk. ii., ch. 28.

2. Biblical Criticism, Theol. & Ord. Lang.: The rendering of Greek diathēkē=a will; a covenant, applied to the Old and New Testaments, which in the opinion of Protestants together constitute the whole Bible. [BIBLE, A. 3.] Sometimes the word Testament is used alone, when it means the New as distinguished from the Old Testament.

těst'-a-měnt'-al, a. [Eng. testament; -al.] Pertaining or relating to a testament or will; testamentary.

těst'-a-měnt'-a-rŭ, adj. [Lat. testamentarius; Fr. testamentaire; Sp. & Ital. testamentario.]

1. Of or pertaining to a will or to wills.

"This spiritual jurisdiction of testamentary causes is a peculiar constitution of this island."—Blackstone: Comment., bk. iii., ch. 7.

2. Bequeathed by will or testament.

"How many testamentary charities have been defeated by the negligence or fraud of executors; by the suppression of a will, the subornation of witnesses, or the corrupt sentence of a judge."—Atterbury.

3. Done, or appointed by, or founded on a last will or testament; as, a testamentary guardian—that is, a guardian appointed by testament or will.

tēt-ra-, pref. [Greek for tetara, from tettares, tessares=four.]

1. Ord.: A prefix used in compounds derived from the Greek, and signifying four, fourfold. Abbreviated to tetr- before a vowel.

2. Chem.: A prefix applied to compounds containing four atoms of a chlorous to one atom of a basylous element, e. g., tetrachloride of tin, SnCl₄. It is also applied to substitution compounds, in which four atoms of hydrogen are replaced by a radicle.

tēt-ra-brānch, s. [TETRABRANCHIATA.] Any individual of the Tetrabranchiata. (Woodward: Mollusca (ed. Tate), p. 183.)

tēt-ra-brānch-ī-ā-ta, s. pl. [Pref. tetra-, and Mod. Lat. branchiata (q. v.).]

1. Zoöl.: An order of Cephalopoda, comprising three families: Nautilidæ, Orthoceratidæ, and Ammonitidæ, though in some recent classifications the second family is merged in the first. Animal creeping, protected by an external shell; head retractile within the mantle; eyes pedunculated; mandibles calcareous; arms very numerous; body attached to shell by adductor muscles and by a continuous horny girdle; branchiæ four; funnel formed by the union of two lobes which do not constitute a distinct tube. Shell external, in the form of an extremely elongated cone, either straight or variously folded or coiled, many-chambered, siphuncled; the inner layers and septa nacreous, the outer layers porcellaneous.

2. Palæont.: They attained their maximum in the Palæozoic period, decreasing from that time onward, and being represented at the present by the single genus Nautilus (q. v.). The Nautilidæ proper and Orthoceratidæ are preëminently Palæozoic, while the Ammonitidæ are almost exclusively Mesozoic.

tēt-ra-brān'-chī-ate, a. [TETRABRANCHIATA.] Having four gills.

tē-trāç'-ēr-a, s. [TETRACEROS.]

Botany: A genus of Delimeæ (q. v.), owing its scientific name to the fact that its four capsules are recurved like horns. Shrubs or small trees, often climbing, with alternate, stalked, feather-nerved, naked leaves, often rough above, and panicled or racemose inflorescence. A decoction of Tetracera breyniana and T. oblongata is given in Brazil in swelling of the legs. T. tigarea is diaphoretic, diuretic, and antisyphilitic.

tē-trāç'-ēr-ōs, s. [Gr. tetrakerōs=four-horned: tetra=four, and keras=a horn.]

Zoöl.: A genus of Bovidæ, sub-family Cephalophinæ, with two species, from the hilly parts of India; rare north of the Ganges. Horns four, straight and conical; in one species the anterior pair rudimentary. [CHIKARAH.]

tēt-ra-chē'-nī-ūm, s. [Pref. tetr(a)-, and Mod. Lat. achenium (q. v.).]

Bot.: A fruit formed by the adhesion of four achenes.

tēt-ra-chlör-ō-va-lēr'-ic, adj. [Prefix tetra-; chloro-, and Eng. valeric.] [QUADRICHLOREVAL-ERIC.]

tēt'-ra-chord, s. [Gr. tetrachordon, from tetra-, and chordē=a string, a chord; Fr. tetrachorde.]

Music:

1. A scale-series of four notes. The word in its modern sense signifies a half of the octave scale, e. g., from C to F, or from G to C. The position of the tones and semitones is similar in both tetrachords. A third tetrachord placed above these two would lead into the key of G, and another in the key of D. The fundamental system in ancient music was the tetrachord, or system of four sounds, of which the extremes were at an interval of a fourth.

*2. A lyre with four strings.

"Terpander . . . substituted the seven-stringed cithara for the old tetrachord."—Donaldson: Theater of the Greeks, p. 31.

¶ (1) Conjunct tetrachords: Tetrachords which overlap, as C to F, and F to B.

(2) Disjunct tetrachords: Tetrachords which have a degree between them, as C to F, and G to C. Similar disjunct tetrachords necessarily pass through the whole key-series, and a combination of conjunct and disjunct tetrachords is required to form a diatonic scale of more than one octave in compass.

tēt-ra-chord'-al, a. [Eng. tetrachord; -al.] Of or pertaining to tetrachords; formed of tetrachords.

tetrachordal-system, s.

Music: The early form of the system now known as Tonic Sol-fa (q. v.).

tēt-ra-chor'-dōn, s. [TETRACHORD.]

Music: An instrument similar in appearance to a cottage pianoforte, and like it played by finger-board, but the tone, instead of being produced by striking, is obtained by means of a cylinder of india-rubber charged with resin, kept in motion by a pedal, variety of tone being gained by the depth of pressure on the keys by the fingers. It is called the tetrachordon from an idea that its sounds are similar to those produced by a string quartet. The instrument is constructed also with self-acting machinery.

¶ Milton used the word as the title of one of his treatises on marriage, occasioned by his disagreement with his wife, Mary Powell. He explained the word in the sub-title: "Expositions upon the Four Chief Places of Scripture which treat of Marriage."

tēt-ra-chōt'-ō-mōus, adj. [Gr. tetrachos=four-fold, and tomē=a cutting.]

Science: Having a division by fours; separated into four parts or series, or into series of fours.

tēt-ra-clā'-sīte, s. [Pref. tetra-; Gr. klasis=a fracture, and suff. -ite (Min.); Ger. tetraklasit.]

Min.: The same as PARANTHINE (q. v.).

tēt-ra-cōc'-cōus, a. [Pref. tetra-, and Gr. kokkos=a kernel, a berry.]

Bot.: Having four cells elastically dehiscing and separating.

bōil, bōy; pōut, jōwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, çem; thin, çhis; sin, aç; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f. -clan, -tian = shan. -tion -sion = shün: tion, -sion = zhün. -tious, -cious, -sious = shüs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bel, del tět-řa-cō'-lōn, s. [Pref. tetra-, and Eng. colon (q. v.).]

Pros.: A stanza or division of lyric poetry consisting of four verses.

tět-řa-cō-rāl'-lā, s. pl. [Pref. tetra-, and Latin coralla, pl. of corallum=red cone.]

Zoöl.: Hæckel's name for the Rugosa, because the septa are multiples of four.

tět-řac-tī-něl'-lī dæ, s. pl. [Pref. tetra-; Lat. dimin. of Gr. aktis (genit. aktinos)=a ray, and Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Zoölogy: A sub-order of Siliceous Sponges, with four-rayed spicules. Families, Choristidæ and Lithistidæ.

tět'-řād, s. [Lat. tetrās (genit. tetradis), from Gr. tetras (genit. tétrados); Fr. tétrade.]

*1. Ord. Lang.: The number four; a collection of four things.

"I find the ignorance of posterity to have abused the Tetrad, as religiously as it was admired by the knowing Pythagoreans, to be a receptacle of superstitious and useless toys."—More: Defense of the Moral Cabala, ch. iv., §2. (App.)

2. Chem.: Quadrivalent element. A name given to those elements which can directly unite with or replace four atoms of hydrogen, chlorine, or other monatomic element.

tět-řa-dăc'-tŷl, s. [Pref. tetra-, and Greek daktylos=a finger, a toe.] An animal having four digits on each limb.

tět-řa-dăc'-tŷl-oŭs, a. [TETRADACTYL.] Having four digits on each limb.

tě-řa-dē'-cāne, subst. [Pref. tetra-, and Eng. decane.] [QUATUORDECANE.]

tět-řa-dē-cāp'-ō-dā, s. pl. [Prefix tetra-; Gr. deka=ten, and pous (genit. podos)=a foot.]

Zoöl.: Agassiz's name for the Edriophthalmata (q. v.), from the fact that in the typical adult there are seven pairs of feet.

tět-řa-dēc'-ā-tŷl, s. [TETRADECYL.]

tět-řa-dē'-cŷl, s. [Pref. tetra-, and Eng. decyl.]

Chemistry: C₁₄H₂₈. Tetradeceyl. Myristyl. The fourteenth term of the series of alcohol radicles, C_nH_{2n+1}. (Watts.)

tět-řa-dē'-cŷl'-ic, a. [Eng. tetradeceyl; -ic.] Of or belonging to tetradeceyl (q. v.).

tetradeceylic-alcohol, s. [MYRISTIC-ALCOHOL.]

Chem.: C₁₄H₃₀. One of the constituents of American petroleum. It boils between 238° and 240°, and is converted by chlorine into the corresponding chloride, C₁₄H₂₉Cl.

tět-řa-dī-ā-pā'-šōn, s. [Pref. tetra-, and Eng. diapason (q. v.).]

Music: Quadruple diapason or octave; a musical chord, otherwise called a quadruple eighth or twenty-ninth.

tě-trăd'-ic, a. [Eng. tetrad; -ic.] Of or pertaining to a tetrad; tetratomic.

tět-řa-dites, s. pl. [Gr. tetradistai=young people who feasted on the fourth day of the month.]

1. Gr. Antiq.: Persons who were born on the fourth day of the month, which was reputed to be lucky.

2. Church History (in this sense probably directly from Gr. tetra-, in comp.=four):

(1) Heretics who fasted at Easter, as on Wednesday.

(2) Certain ancient sects who held the number four in special reverence, to the extent of supposing the existence of a fourth person added to the Trinity.

tět'-řa-drăchm (ch silent), tět'-řa-drăch'-mā, s. [Gr. tetradrachmon, from tetra=fourfold, and drachmē=a drachm.]

Gr. Coin.: An ancient silver coin, value four drachmas, or about 79 cents.

tě-trăd'-ŷm-ite, s. [Gr. tetradymos=fourfold, quadruple; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Mineralogy:

1. A rhombohedral mineral found sometimes in crystals, but more frequently granular, massive, or foliated, often with auriferous ores. Hardness, 1.5 to 2; specific gravity, 7.2 to 7.9; luster, bright metallic; color, pale steel-gray; somewhat sectile, in thin laminae, flexible; soils paper. Composition: Somewhat variable, but consists principally of bismuth and tellurium. Dana divides as follows: (a) Free from sulphur, with formula Bi₂Te₃; (b) Sulphurous, with formula Bi₂(Te+½S)₃, and (c) Seleniferous.

2. The same as JOSEITE (q. v.).

3. The same as WEHLITE (q. v.).

tě-trăd'-ŷm-oŭs, a. [Gr. tetradymos=fourfold.]

Bot.: Having four cells or cases.

tět-řa-dŷ-nā'-mī-ā, s. pl. [Pref. tetra, and Gr. dynamis=might, strength, referring to four stamens being longer than the others.]

Bot.: The fifteenth class in Linnæus' Artificial System. Plants with six stamens, four long and two short. Orders, Siliculosa, and Siliquosa.

tět-řa-dŷ-nā'-mī-ān, tět-řa-dŷ'-nā-moŭs, a. [TETRADYNAMIA.]

Botany:

1. (Of stamens): Six in number, four long and two short.

2. (Of a plant): Having six stamens, four long and two short; of or belonging to the Tetradynamia (q. v.).

tět-řa-ē'-drāl, tět-řa-ē'-drōn, s. [TETRAEDRAL, TETRAHEDRON.]

tě-trăg'-nā-thā, s. [L. t. tetragynathus=a kind of spider; Gr. tetragynathos=having four jaws, spec. used of a kind of spider.]

Zoöl.: A genus of Epeiridæ. Tetragynathus extensa is a spider about half an inch long, frequenting damp places. It has long diverging falces, and the legs extended before and behind, nearly in a line with the body.

tět'-řa-gōn, s. [Fr. tetragone=having four angles or corners, from Lat. tetragonus; Gr. tetragōnos, from tetra=fourfold, and gōnia=an angle, from gonu=a knee.]

1. Geom.: A figure having four angles, and consequently four sides, as a square, a rhombus, a quadrangle.

2. Astrol.: An aspect of two planets with regard to the earth when they are distant from each other 90°, or the fourth of a circle.

tě-trăg'-ōn-āl, a. [Eng. tetragon; -al.]

1. Geom.: Pertaining to a tetragon; having four angles or sides, as a square, a parallelogram, &c.; four-sided, quadrangular.

2. Astrol.: In position of a tetragon; distant 90° from each other.

"Reckoning on unto the seventh day, the moon will be in a tetragonal or quadrate aspect, that is, four signs removed from that wherein the disease began."—Browne: Vulgar Errors, bk. iv., ch. xii.

3. Bot.: Four-cornered, angular; used of some ovaries, the stems of the Labiatae, &c.

4. Crystall.: [TETRAGONAL-SYSTEM.]

tetragonal-system, s.

Crystall.: A system of crystallization in which the lateral axes are equal, being the diameters of a square, while the vertical is either longer or shorter than the lateral. Called also the Dimetric, Monodimetric, or Pyramidal System. (Dana.)

tě-trăg'-ōn-āl-ŷ, adv. [Eng. tetragonal; -ly.] In a tetragonal or four-cornered manner.

tět-řa-gō'-nē-æ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. tetragon(ia); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -eæ.]

Bot.: The typical sub-order of Tetragoniaceæ. The fruit is woody and indehiscent.

tět-řa-gō'-nī-ā, s. [Gr. tetragōnia=the spindle-tree; tetra-, and gōnia=a corner, an angle.]

Bot.: The typical genus of Tetragoniaceæ (q. v.). Chiefly littoral plants with alternate, stalked, fleshy leaves, and apetalous flowers, having four to twelve stamens and three to eight short styles. Nearly all the species from the Southern Hemisphere. Tetragonia expansa, a native of New Zealand, is called New Zealand spinach, and is cultivated in Europe as a substitute for spinach itself.

tět-řa-gō-nī-ā'-cē-æ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. tetragoni(a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -aceæ.]

Bot.: Aizoons; an order of Perigynous Exogens, alliance Ficoidales. Succulent-leaved herbs, more rarely small shrubs. Leaves alternate, often with watery pustules, exstipulate. Flowers small, axillary; calyx three to five-cleft; corolla wanting; stamens definite; styles two to nine; ovary with many cells as there are styles; fruit an indehiscent nut, or a capsule splitting all round. Found in the South Sea Islands, the Cape, and the Mediterranean region. Tribes, Tetragoneæ and Sesuvææ. Genera, eleven; species, sixty-five. (Lindley.)

tě-trăg'-ōn-ŷm, s. [Gr. tetragōnizō=to make square; tetragōnos=four-angled, tetragonal; Fr. tétragonisme.] The attempt to square the circle.

tět-řa-gō-nō-, prefix. [TETRAGONISM.] Having four angles or corners.

tět-řa-gō-nō-lēp'-ŷs, s. [Pref. tetragono-, and Gr. lepis=a scale.]

Palæont.: A genus of Styliodontidæ, from the Lias. Each scale bears upon its inner anterior margin a thick, solid, bony rib, extending upward beyond the margin of the scale, and sliced off obliquely above and below, on opposite sides, for forming splices with the corresponding processes of adjoining scales.

tět-řag-ōn-ōl'-ō-bŭs, s. [Pref. tetragono-, and Gr. lobos=a lobe.]

Bot.: A genus of Trifoliæ, akin to Lotus (q. v.), but with quadrangular winged legumes. Tetragonolobus edulis, or purpureus, is the Winged Pea. It is a native of Sicily, where its legumes were formerly eaten by the poor. It is cultivated as a border plant.

tět-řa-gōn-ōp-tēr-i'-nā, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. tetragonopter(us); Lat. neut. pl. adj. suff. -ina.]

Ichthyology: A group of Characinidæ, with four genera, from South Africa and tropical America. A short dorsal and adipose fin present; teeth in both jaws well developed; gill-membranes free; nasal openings close.

tět-řa-gōn-ōp-tēr-ŭs, s. [Pref. tetragono-, and Gr. pteron=a wing, a fin.]

Ichthyology: The type-genus of Tetragonopterina (q. v.), with about fifty species, from Central America. They are all of small size, rarely exceeding eight inches in length; dorsal in middle of the body, which is oblong or elevated, covered with scales of moderate size; belly rounded.

tě-trăg'-ōn-oŭs, a. [Eng. tetragon; -ous.] The same as TETRAGONAL (q. v.).

tět-řa-gō-nŭr'-ŭs, s. [Pref. tetragon(o)-, and Gr. oura=a tail.]

Ichthy.: A genus of Atherinidæ, with a single species. Body sub-elongate, scales strongly keeled and striated; first dorsal of numerous feeble spines, and continuous with the second. It is a rare fish, more frequently met with in the Mediterranean than in the Atlantic. Nothing is known of its habits, but as, when young, it accompanies the Medusæ, it must be regarded as a pelagic form. At a later period of its existence, it probably descends to greater depths, coming to the surface only at night. It attains a length of about eighteen inches.

tět'-řa-grām, s. [Greek tetra-, and gramme=a line.]

1. A word of four letters. [TETRAGRAMMATON.]

"A host of other words, significant of Deity, are tetragrams."—Brewer: Phrase and Fable, s. v. Tetragrammaton.

2. Geom.: A figure formed by four right lines.

tět-řa-grām'-mā-tōn, s. [Gr. to tetragrammaton=the word of four letters; tetragrammatos=of four letters; tetra-, and gramma (genit. grammatos)=a letter.]

1. The sacred Hebrew name of the Deity (יהוה), from the fact that in the Rabbinical writings it is distinguished by various euphemistic expressions; as, "the name," "the name of four letters," &c.

"In his sacred confessions he [the high priest] had to pronounce ten times the sacred Tetragrammaton—the ineffable name of Jehovah."—Farrar: Early Days of Christianity, ch. xviii., §5.

2. Hence, applied to other words of four letters expressive of Deity.

tět-řa-grăp'-tŭs, s. [Pref. tetra-, and Greek grapto=written, marked with letters.]

Palæont.: A genus of Graptolitidæ from the Skiddaw and Quebec groups (Lower Silurian). The polypary consists of four simple mono-prionidian branches, springing from a central non-celluliferous connecting process, which bifurcates at each end. The celluliferous branches do not subdivide, and the base may be enveloped in a peculiar horny disc.

tět'-řa-gŷn, s. [TETRAGYNIA.]

Bot.: Any individual of the Tetragynia.

tět-řa-gŷn'-ī-ā, s. pl. [Pref. tetra-, and Greek gynē=a woman, a female.]

Bot.: An order of plants in Linnæus' Artificial System. It consisted of plants having four pistils. The classes Tetrandria, Pentandria, Hexandria, Heptandria, Octandria, and Polyandria, have each an order Tetragynia.

tět-řa-gŷn'-ī-ān, tě-trăg'-ŷn-oŭs, a. [TETRAGYNIA.]

Bot.: Having four carpels or four styles.

tět-řa-hē'-drāl, tět-řa-ē'-drāl, a. [TETRAHEDRON.]

*1. Ord. Lang.: Having four sides; composed of four sides.

2. Crystallography:

(1) Having the form of the regular tetrahedron.

(2) Pertaining or relating to a tetrahedron, or the system of forms to which the tetrahedron belongs.

Geom.: A polyhedral angle having four faces.

tetrahedral-garnet, s.

Min.: The same as HELVINE (q. v.).

tět-řa-hē'-drite, s. [Eng. tetrahedr(on); suff. -ite (Min.); Ger. fahlerz, tetraedrit.]

Min.: A name given to a group of minerals having considerable diversity in composition, but presenting the same general formula. Named from the fâte, fât, fâre, amidst, whât, fâll, father; wē, wēt, hère, camel, hēr, thère; pîne, pît, sîre, sîr, marine; gō, pôt, or, wôre, wôlf, wôrk, whô, sôn; mûte, cûb, cûre, unite, cûr, rûle, fûll; trŷ, Sŷrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = â. qu = kw.

prevailing tetrahedral habit of its crystals. Crystallization isometric, frequently twinned; hardness, 3-4.5; specific gravity, 4.5-5.11; luster, metallic; color and streak, steel-gray to iron-black; opaque; fracture, sub-conchoidal, uneven; brittle. Composition, essentially a sulphantimonite of copper, with the formula $4\text{CuS} + \text{Sb}_2\text{S}_3$; but in consequence of part of the copper being frequently replaced by iron, zinc, silver, mercury, and occasionally cobalt, and part of the antimony by arsenic or bismuth, the general formula is usually written as $4(\text{Cu, Fe, Zn, Ag, Hg}) + (\text{Sb, As, Bi})_2\text{S}_3$. Dana divides tetrahedrites as follows: 1. An antimonial series; 2. An arsenio-antimonial series; 3. A bismuthic-arsenio-antimonial and an arsenical series, in which the antimony is entirely replaced by arsenic. [TENNANTITE.] The varieties are: (1) Ordinary, containing very little or no silver; (2) argenterous = freibergite; (3) mercuriferous = schwartzite, spaniolite, and hermesite; (4) platiniferous. Fieldite, apophanite, and polytelite (q. v.) are sub-species. An abundant ore in many parts of the world, sometimes, where rich in silver, mined for that metal only.

tět-řa-hě-drōn, tět-řa-ě-drōn, s. [Gr. tetra=fourfold, and hedra=a base.]

Geom.: A polyhedron bounded by four triangles. If the middle points of the faces be properly joined, two and two, the lines joining them are the edges of a second tetrahedron. A regular tetrahedron is one in which the faces are equal and equilateral triangles. If the middle points of the faces be joined two and two, the lines joining them form the edges of a regular tetrahedron. All regular tetrahedrons are similar solids.

Tetrahedron.

tět-řa-hěx-a-hě-drāl, adj. [TETRAHEXAHEDRON.] Having the form of a tetrahexahedron.

tět-řa-hěx-a-hě-drōn, subst. [Pref. tetra-, and Eng. hexahedron (q. v.).] A solid bounded by twenty-four equal faces, four corresponding to each face of the cube. Also called a Tetrakishehexahedron.

tět-řa-kis-hěx-a-hě-drōn, s. [Gr. tetrakis=four times, and Eng. hexahedron.] [TETRAHEXAHEDRON.]

tě-trāl'-ō-gŷ, s. [Gr. tetralogia, from tetra=four, and logos=a discourse; Fr. tétralogie.]

Greek Drama: The name given to a collection of four dramatic compositions—a trilogy (q. v.) and a satyric piece—exhibited together on the Athenian stage for the prize given at the festival of Bacchus. [SATYRIC, ¶.] The expression tetralogy is sometimes applied by modern authors to a series of four connected plays.

"This would give us twenty-seven tetralogies or one hundred and eight plays."—Donaldson: Theater of the Greeks, p. 118.

tět-řa-lōph'-ō-dōn, s. [Pref. tetra-, and Gr. lophos=a crest, and suff. -odon.]

Palæont.: A section of the genus Mastodon marked off by Falconer, from the fact that the molars are four-ridged. The section is represented in the Miocene and Pliocene of Europe, in the Sivalik strata.

tět-řa-lōph'-ō-dōnt, a. [TETRALOPHODON.] Of or belonging to section Tetralophodon; possessing four-ridged molars.

"Tetralophodont types of the genus appear to have been represented in the Miocene period."—Nicholson: Palæontology, ii. 387.

tě-trām'-ěr-a, s. pl. [Pref. tetra-, and Gr. meros=a part.]

Zoöl.: In Latreille's classification, a section of the Coleoptera (q. v.). They are distinguished by the atrophy of the fourth tarsal joint in all the feet, so that they have only four freely articulating joints. The atrophied joint is generally extremely minute, and concealed in the deep notch of the third joint, which, in the majority of the species, is bilobed and clothed beneath with a brush of minute hairs. The section includes more than a third of the whole order, and all the species are vegetable-feeders.

tě-trām'-ěr-ōūs, a. [TETRAMERA.]

I. Ord. Lang.: Consisting of four parts; characterized by having four parts.

II. Technically:

1. Bot.: Divided into four parts; having four parts or pieces. (Asa Gray.)

2. Entom.: Of or pertaining to the Tetramera (q. v.).

tě-trām'-ě-těr, s. [Pref. tetra-, and metron=a measure, a meter.]

Anc. Pros.: A verse consisting of four measures, that is, in iambic, trochaic, and anapestic verse, of eight feet; in other kinds of verse of four feet.

"The first are couplets interchanged of sixteen and fourteen feet, the second of equal tetrameters."—Drayton: Polyolbion, s. 4. (Selden's Illust.) tět-řa-mě-thŷl, s. [Prefix tetra-, and English methyl.] Containing four atoms of methyl.

tetramethyl-ethylene, s.

Chem.: A crystalline mass obtained by heating to 100° one volume of ethylenic bromide with two volumes of methylic sulphide. It is soluble in hot water and alcohol, insoluble in ether, and is precipitated by ether from its alcoholic solution, in white prisms.

tět-řa-morph, s. [Pref. tetra-, and Gr. morphē=form, figure.]

Christ. Art.: The union of the four attributes of the evangelists in one figure, winged, standing on winged, fiery wheels, the wings being covered with eyes. It is the type of unparalleled velocity. (Fairholt.)

tět-trān'-děř, s. [TETRANDRIA.]

Bot.: Any individual of the Tetrandria (q. v.).

tět-trān'-drī-a, s. pl. [Pref. tetra-, and Gr. anēr (genit. andros)=a male.]

Bot.: The fourth class in Linnæus' Artificial System. It consists of plants having four stamens of equal length. Orders: Monogynia, Digynia, and Tetragynia.

tět-trān'-droūs, tět-trān'-drī-an, a. [TETRANDRIA.]

Botany:

1. (Of the form tetrandrous): Having four stamens; spec., having four stamens of equal length.

2. (Of the form tetrandrian): Of or belonging to the Tetrandria (q. v.).

tět-rāne, s. [Greek tetra- in comp.=four; suff. -ane.] [BUTANE.]

tět-rant, s. [Gr. tetra=four.] One of the four equal parts into which the area of a circle is divided by two diameters drawn at right angles to each other. (Weale.)

tět-trān'-thēr-a, subst. [Pref. tetr(a)-, and Gr. anthēros=blooming.]

Bot.: A genus of Lauraceæ (q. v.). Trees mostly from the East, with feather-veined leaves and umbels of generally dioecious flowers, surrounded by bracts. The fruit of Tetranthera roxburghii yields a fatty exudation. The fruit of T. laurifolia, a moderate-sized Indian and Javanese tree, yields an oil. The seeds of T. monopetala, also an Indian tree, furnish an oil used for ointment and for candles. The oil from the berries of T. laurifolia is used in rheumatism, the bark saturated in water or milk is applied to bruises. It is given internally in diarrhœa, dysentery, &c. The tree has a fine wood. The bark of T. monopetala is mildly astringent and has balsamic properties. It is used medicinally like the oil from the former species.

tět-trān'-ŷ-chūs, s. [Pref. tetra-, and Gr. onyx (genit. onychos)=a claw.]

Zoöl.: A genus of Trombididæ. Tetranychus telarius is the Red Spider (q. v.). T. glaber is found under stones in damp places, and T. lapidum under stones and on plants.

tět-rā-ō, s. [Lat., from Gr. tetraōn=the black-cock.]

1. Ornith.: The type genus of Tetraoninæ (q. v.), with seven species, from the northern parts of Palearctic and Nearctic regions; but in some localities where they were formerly abundant, they now exist in greatly reduced numbers, and in some places have become extinct. Bill strong, upper mandible curved, head slightly crested, feathers of the chin elongated and pointed, tarsi completely covered with hair-like feathers.

2. Palæont.: From the Post-pliocene of Italian caves.

tět-trā-ō-dōn, s. [TETRODON.]

tět-rā-ō-gāl'-lūs, subst. [Mod. Lat. tetrao, and gallus.]

Ornith.: Snow-partridge; a genus of Perdicinæ, with four species, ranging from the Caucasus and Himalayas to the Altai Mountains. Bill short, broad at the base, with tip curved; head plumed; tarsi naked, shorter than middle toe, in the males armed with strong spur; hallux raised, short; wings with second and third quills longest; tail broad, rounded.

tět-trā-ō-nīd a. & s. [TETRAONIDÆ.]

A. As adj.: Of or pertaining to the Tetraonidæ (q. v.).

B. As subst.: One of the family of Tetraonidæ.

tět-rā-ōn'-ī-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. tetrao, genit. tetraonis; Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Ornith.: A family of Gallinæ, or Game Birds, with four sub-families, Tetraoninæ, Perdicinæ, Odontophorinæ, and Pteroclinæ (often elevated to the rank of a family). The Tetraonidæ include the Grouse, Partridges, Quails, and allied forms. Wallace (Geog. Dist. Anim., ii. 338) considers that they are essentially denizens of the great northern continents, and that their entrance into South America, Australia, and South Africa is, comparatively speaking, recent. They have developed into forms equally suited to the tropical plains and the arctic regions, some of them being among the few denizens of the extreme north as well as of the highest alpine snows. He puts the genera at twenty-nine and the species at 120. [TETRAD.]

tět-rā-ō-nī-næ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. tetrao (genit. tetraonis); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -inæ.]

Ornith.: The typical sub-family of the Tetraonidæ (q. v.), chiefly from the northern parts of the Palearctic and Nearctic regions, with the following genera: Tetrao, Bonasa, Centrocercus, Dendragapus, Canace, Falcipennis, Pediocætes, Cupidonia, and Lagopus. They are rather large in size, heavy in body, with small heads, the nasal fossæ filled with feathers concealing the nostrils; neck moderately long, wings short, rounded, and concave beneath; stout legs and feet; toes with pectinations of scales along the edges, hind toe elevated above the plane of the rest; tarsi covered with feathers, in Bonasa partially, in Lagopus to the claws.

tět-trā-ō-nŷx, s. [TETRANYCHUS.]

Zoöl.: An Asiatic genus of Emydæ; having five toes, but one on each foot without a nail. Twenty-five marginal scales. Species, Tetraonyx lessonii and T. baska.

tět-rā-ō-phā'-sis, s. [Mod. Lat. tetrao, and Lat. phasis.] [PHEASANT.]

Ornith.: Lophophorus obscurus; often made a separate genus of the sub-family Lophophorinæ (q. v.), connecting the Phasianinæ with Tetraogallus, and so with the Perdicinæ. This bird was discovered by Père David in Tibet, and described by him. General color brown, marked with darker shades; bare skin of face red, tarsi and feet horn-color. The sexes are alike in plumage; female destitute of spurs.

tět-řa-pět'-al-ōūs, a. [Pref. tetra-, and Eng. petalous (q. v.).]

Bot.: Having four petals.

"All the tetrapetalous siliqueous plants are alkaliescent."—Arbutnot.

tět-řa-phar'-ma-cōn, tět-řa-phar'-ma-cŷm, s. [Pref. tetra-, and Gr. pharmakon=a drug.] A combination of wax, resin, lard and pitch, composing an ointment.

tět-řa-phē'-nōl, s. [Pref. tetra-, and English phenol.]

Chemistry: $\text{C}_6\text{H}_4\text{O}$. A neutral, colorless liquid, obtained by distilling the pyromucates with soda-lime. It boils at 32°.

tět-řa-phŷl'-ine, s. [Pref. tetra-, and Gr. phylē=a stem, suff. -ine (Min.).]

Min.: The same as TRIPHYLITE (q. v.).

tět-trāph'-ŷl-loūs, a. [Pref. tetra-, and Greek phyllon=a leaf.]

Bot.: Having four leaves.

tět-řa-plā, s. [Gr. tetraploos=fourfold; French tétraple.]

Sacred Literature: An edition of the whole or a part of the Scriptures in four parallel columns; specif., an edition of the Greek Testament compiled by Origen, containing the versions of Aquila, Symmachus, the Septuagint, and Theodotion. [HEXAPLA.]

tět-řa-pleđ'-řa, s. [Pref. tetra-, and Gr. pleuron=a rib.]

Bot.: A genus of Eumimoseæ.

tět-řap-neŷ'-mō-nēs, s. pl. [Pref. tetra-, and Gr. pneumones=the lungs.]

Zoöl.: Four-lunged Spiders, a tribe of Araneida, with a single family, Mygalidæ (q. v.). There are two pairs of lung-sacs and two pairs of spinnerets, and the claws of the falces bend downward.

tět-řap-neŷ'-mō-nī-an, s. [TETRAPNEUMONES.] Any individual of the tribe Tetrapneumones (q. v.).

tět-řa-pōd, s. [Gr. tetra=four, and pous (genit. podos)=a foot.] A four-footed animal, especially an insect having only four perfect legs, as certain Lepidoptera.

tět-řa-pōd'-ich'-nīte, s. [Eng. tetrapod, and ichnite (q. v.).]

Palæont.: The footprint of a four-footed animal left on the rocks.

tět-trāph'-ō-dŷ, subst. [TETRAPOD.] A series of four feet; a measure or distance of four feet.

Tět-řa-pōl'-ī-tan, adj. [Greek tetrapolis=of or with four cities.] Of or belonging to four towns. (See compound.)

bōl, bōŷ; pōut, jōwł; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, aş; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f. -cian, -tian = şan. -tion, -sion = şŷn; -tion, -şion = zhŷn. -tious, -cious, -şious = şŷş. -ble, -dle, &c. = bēl, del.

Tetrapolitan Confession, s.

Symbolic Books. The Confession of Faith presented to the Diet of Augsburg in 1530 by the representatives of the cities of Constance, Lindau, Memmingen, and Strasburg. It was the same as the Confession of Augsburg, except in a minute verbal difference in the part relating to the Eucharist.

tět-řa-pō-mā, s. [Pref. tetra-, and Gr. pōma=a lid, a cover; so named because the capsule is four-valved.]

Bot.: The typical genus of Tetrapomidae (q. v.). Pouch one-celled, four-valved; with four rows of seeds. Plants from Siberia and Northwestern America.

tět-řa-pō-mī-dā, s. pl. [Modern Latin tetrapom(a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idā.]

Bot.: A family of Pleurorhizace (q. v.).

tět-řa-při-ō-nīd'-ī-an, adj. [Pref. tetra-, and dimin. from Gr. prion=a saw.]

Zoöl.: A term applied to all the forms grouped under Phyllograptus (q. v.), in which the polypary is leaf-like in shape, and consists of four rows of cellulose placed back to back.

tět-řa-prē-tō-dōn, s. [Pref. tetra-, Gr. prōtos=first, and odous (genit. odontos)=a tooth.]

Palæont.: A genus of Hippopotamidae, or a subgenus of Hippopotamus. The group is distinguished from Hexaprotodon (q. v.) by having only four lower incisors. It therefore includes the fossil species from the Pliocene and Post-Pliocene of Europe, and the living Hippopotamus amphibius.

tět-trāp'-tēr-an, s. [Pref. tetra=four, and Gr. pteron=a wing.] An insect which has four wings, the normal number, as distinguished from a dip-teran and an apteran.

tět-trāp'-tēr-ōūs, a. [TETRAPTERAN.] Having four wings or processes resembling wings. (Used chiefly in botany.)

tět-trāp'-tēr-ūs, s. [Pref. tetra-, and Gr. pteron=a fin.]

Palæont.: A genus of Xiphiidae (q. v.), from the Chalk of Lewes and Maestricht and the London Clay of Sheppey.

tēt-řap-tōte, subst. [Gr. tetraptōtos=with four grammatical cases; tetra=four, and ptōsis=a case.]

Gram.: A noun which has four cases only.

tět-řa-pŷ-rēn'-ōūs, adj. [Pref. tetra-, and Gr. pyrēn=the stone of stone-fruit.]

Bot.: Having four stones.

tetraquetrous (as tět-trāk'-wē-trūs), a. [Pref. tetra-, and Lat. quadratus=square.]

Bot.: Having four angles or sides.

tět-trarch, tět-rarch, tet-rark, tet-rarch, s. & a. [Lat. tetrarcha, from Gr. tetrarchēs=a tetrarch, from tetr-, for tetra=four, and archō=to rule; Fr. tétrarque.]

A. As subst.: A Roman governor of the fourth part of a province; a subordinate prince or governor; a petty prince or sovereign.

"While kings and tetrarchs proud, a purple train . . . Possess'd the rising grounds and drier plain."

Rowe: Lucan; Pharsalia, vii.

*B. As adj.: Four principal or chief; as, tetrarch elements. (Fuller.)

tět-trarch-ate, tět-rarch-ate, subst. [Eng. tetrarch; -ate.] The district under a Roman tetrarch; the jurisdiction of a tetrarch; a tetrarchy.

tět-rar'-chic-al, adj. [Gr. tetrarchikos, from tetrarchēs=a tetrarch.] Of or pertaining to a tetrarch or tetrarchy.

"The patriarchs had a sort of tetrarchical, or ethnarchical authority."—Bolingbroke: Authority in Religion, § 32.

tět-řar-chŷ, tet-rar-chie, s. [Fr. tétrarchie, from Lat. tetrarchia; Gr. tetrarchia.] A tetrarchate (q. v.).

"There is a government or tetrarchie also, but out of the quarter of Lycaonia, on that site that bordereth upon Galatia."—P. Holland: Pliny, bk. v., ch. xxvii.

tět-řa-rhŷn'-chūs, subst. [Pref. tetra-, and Gr. rhynchos=the snout.]

Zoöl.: A genus of Plathelmintha. Tapeworms with four proboscis-like tentacles, thickly set with hooklets retracted near the suckers.

tět-řa-sép'-a-loūs, adj. [Pref. tetra-, and Eng. sepalous (q. v.).]

Bot.: Having four sepals.

tět-řa-spās'-tōn, s. [Prefix tetra-, and Greek spadō=to draw, to pull.] A machine in which four pulleys all act together.

tět-řa-spēm'-ōūs, a. [Pref. tetra-, and Greek sperma=a seed.]

Bot.: Having or producing four seeds.

tět-řa-spōre, s. [Prefix tetra-, and Eng. spore (q. v.).]

Bot. (pl.): Little clusters of spores, generally four, rarely eight; one of two forms of fructification found in the Rhodospirace (q. v.).

tět'-řa-spōr-ic, a. [Eng. tetraspor(e); -ic.]

Bot.: Composed of tetraspores.

tět-trāst'-ic, tět-trāst'-ich, tět-trāst'-ick, s.

[Gr. tetrastichos, from tetra=four, and stichos=a row, a verse.] A stanza, poem, or epigram, consisting of four verses.

"The tetrastich obliged Spenser to extend his sense to the length of four lines, which would have been more closely confined in the couplet."—Pope.

tět-trās'-tich-ōūs, a. [TETRASTIC.]

Bot.: Having a four-cornered spike.

tět-trās'-tō-ōn, s. [Gr. tetra=four, and stoa=a portico.]

Arch.: A courtyard with porticoes or open colonnades on each of its four sides. (Britten.)

tět'-řa-style, a. or s. [Prefix tetra-, and Eng. style (q. v.).]

Arch.: Having or consisting of four columns; having a portico consisting of four columns, as the Temple of Fortuna Virilis at Rome; a portico, &c., consisting of four columns. A cavædium was called tetrastyle when the beams of the compluvium were supported by columns placed over against the four angles of a court.

"A tetrastyle of very beautiful Gothic columns."—Defoe: Tour thro' Great Britain, i. 373.

tět-řa-sŷl-lāb'-ic, tět-řa-sŷl-lāb'-ic-al, adj. [Pref. tetra-, and Eng. syllabic, syllabical (q. v.).]

Consisting of four syllables.

tět'-řa-sŷl-lā-ble, s. [Fr., from Low Lat. tetra-syllabus, from Gr. tetrasyllabos.] A word consisting of four syllables.

tět-řa-thē'-cal, a. [Pref. tetra-, and Gr. thēkē=a box.]

Bot. (of a plant): Having four cells in the ovary.

tět-řa-thī-ōn'-ic, a. [Pref. tetra-, Gr. theion=sulphur, and Eng. suff. -ic.] Containing four atoms of sulphur.

tetrathionic-acid, s.

Chem.: $H_2S_4O_6$. A colorless, inodorous, very acid liquid, produced by the action of iodine on hyposulphites. On being boiled it is rapidly decomposed into sulphuric acid, sulphurous acid, and sulphur. The tetrathionates are all soluble in water, insoluble in alcohol.

tět-řa-tōm'-ic, a. [Pref. tetr(a)-, and English atomic (q. v.).] The same as TETRADIC (q. v.).

tět'-rēne, s. [Gr. tetra-, in compos. = four; suff. -ene.] [BUTENE.]

tět-rē-thŷl'-ic, a. [Pref. tetr(a)-, and English ethylic.] Containing four parts of ethyl.

tetrethyllic-silicate, s. [ETHYL-SILICATE.]

tět-ric, tět'-ric-al, tět'-ric-ōūs, tět'-rick, a. [Lat. tetricus, from teter=offensive, foul; Fr. tétrique.] Forward, perverse, harsh, sour, rugged.

"It is not good to be too tetrical and virulent. Kind words make rough actions plausible."—Feltham: Resolves, pt. i., res. 8.

tět'-ric-al-nēss, s. [Eng. tetrical; -ness.] The quality or state of being tetrical; forwardness, perverseness, harshness.

tět-triç-i-tŷ, s. [Eng. tetric; -ity.] Crabbedness, perverseness, tetricallness.

tět'-ric-ōūs, a. [TETRIC.]

tět-rō-dōn, tět-trā'-ō-dōn, s. [Pref. tetra-, and odous (genit. odontos)=a tooth.]

Ichthy.: The type genus of Tetrodontina, having the upper and lower jaws divided by a mesial suture, so as to separate the dentition into four distinct portions.

More than sixty species are known, from tropical and sub-tropical seas. In some the dermal spines are extremely small, and may be absent altogether, and many of them are highly ornamented with spots or bands. A few live in large rivers; as, Tetrodon psittacus, from Brazil; T. fahaka, from the Nile and West African rivers, and T. fluviatilis, from brackish waters and rivers of the East Indies.

tět-rō-dōn-tī'-na, s. pl. [Modern Latin tetrodon, genit. tetrodont(is); Lat. neut. pl. adj. suff. -ina.]

1. Ichthy.: A widely distributed group of Gymnodontes. They are marine fishes, of moderate or small size, from tropical or sub-tropical seas, with a few freshwater species, arranged in eight genera, of which the most important are Tetrodon (including Xenopterus) and Diodon. The body is short, thick, and cylindrical, with well-developed fins, and covered with a thick, scaleless skin, in which spines of various sizes are embedded. They can inflate the body by filling the distensible œsophagus with air, and then they assume a more or less globular form, floating belly upward, whence they are called Globe-fishes; and from their defensive spinous armor they are often known as Sea-hedgehogs. When captured they produce a sound probably by the expulsion of air from the œsophagus. Some of them are highly poisonous; but as the poisonous qualities of their flesh vary greatly in intensity in different species and in different localities, it is probable that they acquire the deleterious properties from their food, which consists of corals and hard-shelled mollusks, for crushing which the broad posterior surface of their jaws is well adapted.

Tetrodon Margeritatus.

2. Palæont.: From the Eocene of Monte Bolca and Licata.

tět-trōl'-ic, a. [Gr. tetra=four; suff. -ol, -ic.]

Chemistry: Having four atoms of carbon in the series.

tetrolic-acid, s.

Chem.: $C_4H_4O_2$. A monobasic acid prepared by heating chlor alpha crotonic acid with alcoholic potassic hydrate on the water-bath, decomposing the potassium salt formed with sulphuric acid, and extracting with ether. It crystallizes in rhombic tables, soluble in alcohol and ether, melts at 76.5°, and boils at 203°.

tět'-rŷl, s. [Gr. tetra=four; suff. -yl.] [BUTYL.]

tět-trŷl'-a-mine, s. [English tetryl, and amine.] [BUTYLAMINE.]

tět'-rŷl-ēne, s. [Eng. tetryl; -ene.] [BUTENE.]

tetrylene-diamine, s.

Chem.: $C_4H_{12}N_2=N_2 \left\{ \begin{smallmatrix} (C_4H_8)'' \\ H_4 \end{smallmatrix} \right.$ A base produced by the action of nascent hydrogen upon ethylene cyanide. It boils at 140°.

tět-rŷl-ēn'-ic, a. [Eng. tetrylen(e); -ic.]

Chem.: Containing tetrylene.

tetrylenic-acetate, s.

Chem.: $C_8H_{14}O_4 = \left\{ \begin{smallmatrix} (C_4H_8)'' \\ (C_2H_3O)_2 \end{smallmatrix} \right\} O_2$. A colorless, oily liquid, prepared by distilling tetrylenic bromide with argentic acetate. Insoluble in water, soluble in alcohol and ether, boils at 200°, and readily decomposed by alkalis.

tetrylenic-alcohol, s. [BUTENE-GLYCOL.]

tetrylenic-bromide, s.

Chem.: $C_4H_8Br_2$. An oily liquid obtained by mixing tetrene with bromine vapor. It boils at 158°.

tetrylenic-chloride, s.

Chem.: $C_4H_8Cl_2$. A colorless oil obtained by the direct union of chlorine with tetrene in diffused daylight. It has a sweetish odor, a burning taste; specific gravity 1.112 at 28°, boils at 123°, is insoluble in water, but soluble in alcohol and ether.

tět'-rŷl-in, s. [Eng. tetryl; -in.]

Chemistry: The hypothetical radical derived from Tetrylene (q. v.).

tetrylin-triamine, s.

Chem.: $C_4H_{13}N_3=N_3 \left\{ \begin{smallmatrix} (C_4H_7)'' \\ H_6 \end{smallmatrix} \right.$ A triatomic base produced by the action of nascent hydrogen on cyanoform. It boils at 170°.

tět-tēr, tet-er, tet-ere, tet-tar, s. [A. S. teter, prob. cogn. with Icel. titra=to shiver, to twinkle; German zittern=to tremble; zittermal=a tetter, ringworm; O. H. Ger. citaroch, zitaroch; Fr. dartre; Sansc. dardru=a tetter.]

1. A cutaneous disease, spreading all over the body, and causing a troublesome itching; herpes (q. v.). [SCALL, ¶.]

2. A name vaguely applied to several cutaneous diseases.

"Suffer the enemies language, as it were a tetter or ringworm, to harbor it self within the iawes of English conquerors."—Holinshed: Descript. Ireland, ch. i.

tetter-berry, s.

Bot.: Bryonia dioica. So named because it cures tetter. (Prior.) But some think that the juice applied to the skin will produce tetter. (Britten & Holland.)

tět'-tēr, v. t. [TETTER, s.] To affect with tetter.

tět'-tēr-ōūs, a. [Eng. tetter, s.; -ous.] Having the character or nature of tetter; affected with tetter.

tět'-tēr-tōt-tēr, s. [TITTERTOTTER, s. & v.]

tět'-tēr-wōrt, subst. [Eng. tetter, and wort.] So named because it cures tetter. (Prior.)

Bot.: Chelidonium majus.

tět-tŷ-gōn'-ī-a, s. [Lat., from Gr. tettigonia=a small cricket or grasshopper.]

Entom.: A genus of Jassidae (q. v.), with very numerous species, chiefly from America. The distance between the ocelli and the ocelli and the eyes equal.

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camēl, hēr, thēre; pine, pit, sīre, sīr, marīne; gō, pōt, or. wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rūle, fūll; trŷ, Sŷrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

*tēt-tī-gō-nī-ā-dæ, s. pl. [Lat. tettigoni(a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -adæ.]

Entom.: An old family of Homoptera, now merged in Jassidae.

*tēt-tīsh, a. [Fr. tête=a head; cf. testy.] Testy, peevish, crabbed, tetchy.

*tēt-tŷ, a. [TETTISH.] Irritable, tetchy.

"So choleric and tetchy that no man may speak with them."—Burton.

teuch, tough, a. [TOUGH.] Tough. (Scotch.)

"Unco thick in the soles, as ye may weel mind, for by being teuch in the upper leather."—Scott: Old Mortality, ch. xxviii.

teu-crīn, s. [Mod. Lat. teucr(ium); -in.]

Chem.: $C_{21}H_{24}O_{11}$. A glucoside obtained from Teucrium fruticans. Nitric acid converts it into a crystallized acid having the composition $C_8H_8O_3$.

teu-crī-ūm, s. [Lat. teucron, from Gr. teukrion=a kind of germander.]

Botany: Germander: a genus of Labiatae, tribe Ajugeae. Calyx tubular, five-toothed, nearly equal, or two-lipped; upper lip of the corolla bipartite, the lower one patent, three-cleft; stamens, much exerted. Known species eighty-six, from temperate and warm countries. The best known species of Germander in this country is Teucrium canadense.

teud-ōp'-sis, s. [Mod. Lat. teuthis, and Gr. opsis=appearance.]

Palaeont.: A genus of Teuthidae, or a sub-genus of Loligo, with five species, from the Upper Lias and Oolite of France and Wurtemberg. Pen like Loligo, but dilated and spatulate behind.

teu-thī-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. teuth(is): Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

1. Zool.: Calamaries, Squids; a family of Dibranchiate Cephalopods, section Octopoda. Body elongated; fins short, broad, and mostly terminal; shell horny, consisting of a shaft and two lateral expansions or wings. There are eighteen genera, very widely distributed, which D'Orbigny divided into two sub-families: Myopsidae (having the eyes covered with skin) and Oigopsidae (having the eyes naked, fins terminal and united, forming a rhomb).

2. Palaeont.: The family appears first in the Lias.

teu-thīd'-ī-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. teuthis, genit. teuthid(is); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Ichthy.: A family of Acanthopterygii Perciformes, with a single genus. [TEUTHIS.] Body oblong, strongly compressed, covered with small scales; lateral line continuous; one dorsal, the spinous portion being the more developed; anal with seven spines; ventrals thoracic, with an outer and an inner spine, with three soft rays between.

teu-thīs, s. [Lat., from Gr. teuthis=a squid.]

Ichthy.: The sole genus of the family Teuthididae (q. v.), with about thirty species from the Indo-Pacific. They are small herbivorous fishes, rather more than a foot long.

teut'-lōse, s. [Gr. teutlon=beet; suff. -ose.]

Chem.: A kind of sugar resembling glucose, said to exist, under certain circumstances, in the juice of beet. (Watts.)

Teu-tōn, subst. [Lat. Teutones.] [TEUTONIC.] Originally one of an ancient German tribe, conquered by the Romans under Marius in B. C. 100; ultimately applied to the Germanic people of Europe generally, and now used to denote Germans, Dutch, Scandinavians, and those of Anglo-Saxon descent, as opposed to Celts.

Teu-tōn'-ic, a. & s. [Lat. Teutonicus, from Teutones, the Latinized form of the native name, the original appearing in M. H. Ger. duitisk=national.] [DUTCH.]

A. As adj.: Of or pertaining to the Teutons, a people of Germanic origin; in a wider sense pertaining to the Scandinavians and people of Anglo-Saxon descent, as well as to German races proper; German, Germanic. [TEUTONIC-NATIONS.]

4. The disposition of the several elementary constituent parts of any body in connection with each other; the manner in which the constituent parts of any body are disposed, arranged, or united.

"While the particles continue entire, they may compose bodies of the same nature and texture now, with water and earth composed of entire particles in the beginning."—Newton.

II. Technically:

1. Anat.: The particular arrangement of the elements of tissues constituting any organ. It is used chiefly in describing the solid portions of the body, but is sometimes extended to the corpuscles of the blood, &c.

2. Petrol.: The state with regard to consolidation of the several rocks (see extract), and the arrangement of their particles, as the "slaty texture." It refers to the arrangement of the parts of a rock on a smaller scale than the word structure.

"The more compact, stony, and crystalline texture of the older as compared to the newer rocks."—Lyell: Princ. of Geol., ch. xii.

těx'-ture, v. t. [TEXTURE, s.] To form a texture of or with; to interweave.

těx'-tū-ry, s. [TEXTURE, s.] The art or process of weaving.

těx'-tūs, s. [Lat.=(1) texture; (2) construction, connection, context.] The text of any book, spec. of the Bible.

textus-receptus, s.

Biblical Criticism: A received text; one from which, as being the best accessible, translators make their version into the vernacular. The textus receptus of the Old Testament is the Hebrew text, from which the Authorized English Version of that portion of the Bible was made. The textus receptus of the New Testament is the Greek text, from which the Authorized English Version was produced. The term textus might also, without impropriety, be used of the Hebrew and Greek texts chosen by the revisers as the basis of the Revised Version. The textus receptus of the Old Testament in the A. V. rested on the Hebrew Masoretic Text, which has come down in manuscripts of no great antiquity, and all of the same family or recension. The oldest Hebrew manuscript of which the age is known, bears date A. D. 916. There are not materials to submit the Hebrew text to proper critical revision, and the revisers adhere to it nearly to the same extent as the translators of the Authorized Version. The case is different with the New Testament. The textus receptus on which the A. V. was constructed was chiefly that of Beza, published in 1559. It had been based on Stephen's edition of 1550, and this again on the fourth edition of Erasmus, A. D. 1517. None of the manuscripts used were of first rate authority. The revisers had the advantage of Codex A (the Alexandrian manuscript) of the fifth century; Codex B (the Vatican manuscript) of the fourth century, or earlier; Codex C (the Ephraim manuscript) of the fifth century; Codex D (the manuscript of Beza) of the sixth century; and Codex Aleph (the Sinaitic manuscript) of the fourth century, discovered by Count Constantine Tischendorf at the convent of St. Catherine on Mount Sinai, in 1844, and published by the discoverer in 1862. Numerous improved readings have therefore been introduced. The text which they chose was published separately by the Clarendon Press at Oxford, England, in 1881.

teyne, s. [Lat. tēnia=a band, a fillet.] A thin plate of metal.

thäck, thak, thakke, s. [A. S. thæc=thatch; cogn. with Dut. dak; Icel. thak; Dan. tag; Sw. tak; Ger. dach.] The older and provincial form of thatch (q. v.).

thäl-äm-ën-çeph'-a-lön, s. [Greek thalamos=a bed-chamber, and engkephalon=the brain.]

Embryol.: A cerebral rudiment corresponding to the thalami optici and the third ventricle of the brain. (Huxley.)

thäl-a-mē-phör-üs, thäl-a-mē-phör-ös (pl. thäl-a-mē-phör-i, thäl-a-mē-phör-oi, s. [Mod. Gr. thalamēphoros: thalamē=an ark, a shrine, and phoros=bearing.]

Egyptian Antiq.: A kneeling figure supporting a shrine or inscribed tablet. These statues probably represent priests and initiated women who carried about in processions the statues of the gods. It was usual for such processions to stand still from time to time, when the priests, kneeling probably, presented to the people the images of the deities, either to be worshipped or kissed. (Herod., ii. 48, 49; see also Montfaucon: Diar. Ital., p. 361.)

"Statues of this class are now commonly called Pastophori or Thalamēphori."—Library Entertaining Knowledge: Egyptian Antiquities, i. 379.

Thalamēphorus.

thäl-a-mī-flör'-æ, s. pl. [Latin thalamus=a bed-chamber, and flos (genit. floris)=a flower.]

Bot.: A sub-class of Dicotyledonous plants established by DeCandolle. Petals many, distinct, inserted in the receptacle; stamens similarly inserted; hence, hypogynous.

thäl-a-mī-flör'-al, a. [Modern Latin thalamiflor (æ); Eng. adj. suff. -al.]

Bot.: Having the petals and stamens inserted in the receptacle; of or belonging to the Thalamifloræ (q. v.).

thä-lä'-mī-üm, s. [Gr. thalamios=belonging to a bed-chamber.]

Botany:

1. A hollow case containing spores in algae.
2. The disc or lamina prolifera of lichens.
3. A form of the hymenium in fungi.

thäl'-a-mūs, subst. [Lat., from Gr. thalamos=a bed-chamber.]

1. Anat.: The place at which it has been thought a nerve originates; spec., the optic thalami (q. v.). Called also the Posterior cerebral ganglia.

2. Botany:

- (1) Tournefort's name for the Clinanthium (q. v.).
- (2) The receptacle or torus at the top of the peduncle of a flower.
- (3) The thallus of a fungal.

thäl-äss, pref. [THALASSO-]

thäl-äss-arc-tös, thäl'-arc-tös, subst. [Pref. thalass-, and Gr. arktos=a bear.]

Zoöl.: Gray's name for Ursus maritimus, the Polar Bear, to which he gave generic distinction.

thäl'-äs-sē-ma, s. [Formed by Cuvier from Gr. thalassa=the sea.]

Zoöl.: A genus of Gephyrea (q. v.). Body cylindrical, rounded, and smooth behind; no tentacles; vent at end of body; proboscis short. It is said that the species penetrate limestone.

thä-läs-sī-cöl'-lā, s. [Gr. thalassa=the sea, and kolla=jelly.]

Zoöl.: The type-genus of Thalassicollida (q. v.). It contains a number of compound, siliceous spicules embedded in the ectosarc.

thä-läs-sī-cöl'-lī-dä, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. thalassicoll (a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -ida.]

Zoöl.: A family of Radiolaria. The animals consist of structureless cysts, containing cellular elements and protoplasm, surrounded by a layer of protoplasm, giving off pseudopodia, which commonly stand out like rays, but sometimes run into another, and so form networks. The best known genera are Thalassicolla, Sphaerozoöm, and Collosphaera. They are all marine, being found floating passively on the surface of most seas, and vary in size from an inch in diameter downward.

thä-läs-sī-cöl'-lī-nä, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. thalassicoll (a); Lat. neut. pl. adj. suff. -ina.]

Zoöl.: An approximate synonym of Thalassicollida (q. v.).

fäte, fät, färe, amidst, whät, fäll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camel, hēr, thēre; pine, pīt, sīre, sīr, marine; gō, pōt, or wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūh, cūre, unite, cūr, rūle, fūll; trȳ, Sȳrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

thāl-ās-sīd'-rō-ma, s. [Gr. thalassa=the sea, and dromeus=a runner.]
Ornith.: An old genus of Procellariidae (q. v.).
[TUBINARES.]

thāl-ās-sī'-na, subst. [Latin thalassinus = sea-colored.]

Zoöl.: The type-genus of Thalassinidae (q. v.), with one species, Thalassina scorpionides, from the coast of Chili.

thāl-ās-sīn'-i-an, s. [THALASSINA.] Any individual of the family Thalassinidae (q. v.).

thāl-ās-sīn'-i-dæ, s. pl. [Modern Lat. thalassin(a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Zoöl.: A widely-distributed family of Macrurous Decapoda. Abdomen long, not very solid, carapace small and compressed; first pair of legs large; sternal plate long and narrow.

thā-lās-sī-ō, pref. [THALASSO-.]

thā-lās-sī-ō-phyl'-lūm, s. [Prefix thalassio, and Gr. phyllon=a leaf.]

Bot.: A genus of Algae, akin to Laminaria, but having the frond spirally wound around the stem. Found on the northwestern shores of Arctic America.

thā-lās-sī-ō-phy'-ta, s. pl. [Pref. thalassio, and Gr. phyton=a plant.]

Bot.: Lamouroux's name for Algæ, because most of them are marine.

thā-lās-sī-ō-phýte, s. [THALASSIOPHYTA.]

Bot.: Any individual of the old order Thalassiophyta (q. v.); an algal.

thā-lās-sō, thāl-āss, thā-lās-sī-ō, prefix. [Gr. thalassios=marine.] Of or belonging to the sea; inhabiting the sea; marine.

thā-lās-sō-chēl'-ýs, s. [Pref. thalasso, and Gr. chelys=a tortoise.]

Zoöl.: Loggerhead Turtle; a genus of Cheloniidae, equivalent to the genus Cauana of older authors, with two or three species from tropical seas. Plates of the carapace not imbricated; fifteen plates on the disc; jaws slightly curved toward each other at their extremity.

thāl-ās-sōm'-ē-tēr, s. [Pref. thalasso, and Eng. meter.] A tide-gauge.

thā-lās-sō-phry'-nē, s. [Pref. thalasso, and Gr. phrynē=a toad.]

Ichthy.: A genus of Batrachidae, with two species, from the Atlantic and Pacific coasts of Central America. The spinous dorsal is formed by two spines only, each of which is hollow, like the opercular spine, and conveys the contents of a poison-bag situated at the base.

The poison-bags have no external muscular layer, and are situated immediately below the thick, loose skin which envelops the spines; the ejection of the poison therefore can only be effected by the pressure to which the poison-bag is subjected the moment the spine enters another body.

thāl-at-tōl'-ō-gý, subst. [Gr. thalatta=the sea; suff. -ology.] The science which treats of the sea.

"A sufficient theory of thalattology."—Proc. Phys. Soc., London, pt. ii.

thāle, s. [Named after Thal (1542-1583), who included the Thale Cress in his Sylva hercynica. (Prior.)] (See compound.)

thale-cress, s.

Bot.: A book name for Arabis thaliana.

thā-lēr (th as t), s. [Ger.] [DOLLAR.] A German silver coin, worth about 73 cents.

Prior to 1871, it was the monetary unit, but in that year was superseded by the mark, value about 24½ cents.

thāl-ēr-ōph'-a-ga, s. pl. [Greek thaleros=blooming, fresh, and phagēin=to eat.]

Entom.: Macleay's name for the Cetoniidae.

thāl-ēr-ōph'-a-goús, adj. [THALEROPHAGA.] Feeding on flowers.

"By the disposition also of the thalerophagous groups."—Swainson & Shuckard: Treatise on Insects, p. 221.

thāl-heim'-ite (or th as t), s. [After Thalheim, Erzgebirge, where found; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: The same as DANAITE (q. v.).

Thā-lī'-a, s. [Gr.]

1. Gr. Mythology: One of the Muses. Thalia was generally regarded as the patron divinity of comedy. She was supposed by some, also, to preside over husbandry and planting, and is represented leaning on a column, holding a mask in her right hand, by which she is distinguished from her sisters, as also by a shepherd's crook.

2. Bot.: A genus of Marantaceæ. Thalia dealbata, an elegant aquatic plant, with panicles of purple flowers, is found in South Carolina.

3. Min.: The earth supposed to be an oxide of a new element thalium (q. v.).

4. Astron.: [ASTEROID, 23.]

thā-lī'-an, thā-lī'-an, adj. [THALIA.] Pertaining or relating to Thalia, the muse of pastoral and comic poetry; comic.

thā-līc'-trūm, s. [Lat.]

Botany: Meadow-rue; a genus of Ranunculaceæ, tribe Anemoneæ. Involucre none; sepals four or five, imbricated in æstivation; corolla wanting; stamens many; styles several; achenes sessile, or nearly so, usually acute at both ends, awnless. Known species fifty, from the temperate and colder parts of the northern hemisphere. Three familiar species are Thalictrum alpinum, the Alpine; T. minus, the Lesser; and T. flavum, the Common Meadow Rue. The most common is T. minus. It has three or four pinnate leaves, with roundish or wedge-shaped leaflets, trifid and toothed, and diffuse panicles of generally drooping flowers. It is found in stony pastures, especially in limestone or chalky districts. There are four sub-species. The root of T. foliolosum, from the temperate parts of the Himalayas, is given in India as a tonic and aperient in convalescence after fever, in chronic dyspepsia, &c.

thā-līte, s. [Eng. thalium; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A variety of saponite (q. v.), occurring in amygdaloidal rocks on the north shore of Lake Superior.

thā-lī-ūm, s. [Etym. doubtful.]

Min.: A name given to a supposed new element, which apparently has no existence.

thāl-lei'-ō-chin, s. [Formed from Gr. thallos=a green bud, and Peruv. quina=bark.]

Chem.: Dalleiochin. A green substance produced by the action of chlorine and then ammonia on a solution of quinine. In dilute solutions it remains dissolved as a bright emerald green color, and forms a highly delicate test for the presence of small quantities of quinine.

thāl-lēne, s. [Gr. thall(os); -ene.]

Chem.: A solid hydrocarbon isomeric with anthracene obtained from the last products which pass over in the distillation of American petroleum. It is distinguished by a green fluorescence, and, when illuminated by violet and ultra-violet light, exhibits a fluorescent spectrum containing light-green bands. (Watts: Sup.) thāl-līc, a. [Eng. thall(ium); -ic.] Pertaining to or containing thallium.

thallic-chloride, s. [THALLIUM-CHLORIDE.]

thallic-oxide, s. [THALLIUM-OXIDE.]

thāl-lī-ōūs, a. [Eng. thalli(um); -ous.] Pertaining to thallium.

thallious-chloride, s. [THALLIUM-CHLORIDE.]

thallious-oxide, s. [THALLIUM-OXIDE.]

thāl-līte, s. [Greek thallos=a twig; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: The same as OISANITE (q. v.).

thāl-lī-ūm, s. [Latinized from Gr. thallos=a green bud, from the green line it gives in the spectrum, which led to its discovery.]

Chemist.: Symbol Tl. Atomic weight 203.64. A triad metallic element discovered by Crookes in 1861, and widely distributed as a constituent in iron and copper pyrites, in blende, native sulphur, and in many kinds of ores. It can be distilled along with the sulphur by heating pyrites to a bright-red heat, then dissolving out the excess of sulphur by boiling with caustic soda, collecting and washing the sulphide of thallium, converting it into sulphate, and precipitating the thallium in the metallic state by the action of pure metallic zinc. The spongy metal is compressed, dried, and fused into a bright metallic button by heating under cyanide of potassium. It is a perfect metal, with high luster, not quite so white as silver, but free from the blue tinge of lead. It has a specific gravity of 11.80-11.91, melts at 293°, is a very soft metal, with less tenacity than lead, and almost devoid of elasticity. It communicates an intense green hue to a colorless flame, and its spectrum consists of one intensely brilliant and sharp green line, coinciding with the number 1442.6 on Kirchhoff's chart.

thallium-alcohol, s. [THALLIUM-ETHER.]

thallium-chloride, s.

Chem.: Thallium forms four chlorides:

(1) Dichloride of thallium, Tl_2Cl_4 . A pale yellow compound formed by carefully heating the protochloride in a slow current of chlorine.

(2) Sesquichloride of thallium, Tl_2Cl_3 . Produced by dissolving thallium in nitromuriatic acid. It separates in yellow crystalline scales, and dissolves in 380 times its weight of water at 15.5°.

(3) Thallic chloride, $TlCl_3$. Formed by dissolving the trioxide in hydrochloric acid. The hydrated chloride can be obtained in long colorless prisms, which melt easily, and decompose at a high temperature.

(4) Thallous chloride, $TlCl$. Formed by adding hydrochloric acid to a thallous salt. A white curdy precipitate resembling chloride of silver is produced, which dissolves like chloride of lead in boiling water. It is insoluble in alcohol.

thallium-ether, s.

Chem. (pl.): Compounds formed by the action of thallium on alcohols, e. g., Thallium-ethylate = C_2H_5TlO . Produced when thallium and ethylic alcohol are heated in a sealed tube to 100°. Being freed from excess of alcohol, it remains as an oil of specific gravity 3.48-3.55, being the heaviest liquid known except mercury. It dissolves in five parts absolute alcohol, in pure ether, and chloroform.

thallium-glass, s. A glass of great density and refracting power, in the preparation of which thallium is used instead of lead or potassium.

thallium-oxide, s.

Chem.: Thallium forms two oxides:

(1) Thallous oxide (protoxide), Tl_2O . Prepared by allowing the granulated metal to oxidize in moist air, boiling in distilled water, and repeating the process two or three times. The hydrated oxide crystallizes out in yellow needles. The anhydrous oxide forms a reddish black mass, and is obtained by exposing the hydrated oxide in a vacuum over sulphuric acid. In water it forms a strongly alkaline solution, which dissolves the skin and stains the nails a deep brown. Like potash, it decomposes the salts of the alkaline earths and metals.

(2) Thallic oxide (peroxide), Tl_2O_3 . The chief product of burning the metal in oxygen. The anhydrous oxide is a dark-brown powder, neutral to test paper, insoluble in water and alkalies, but dissolves readily in acids, forming unstable salts.

thallium-salts, s. pl.

Chem.: Both oxides form, with acids, definite and crystallizable salts, none of which is of much importance.

thallium-triamine, s.

Chem.: N_3TlH_6 . Known in combination as a hydrochlorate, $N_3TlH_6 \cdot 3HCl$, a compound formed by dissolving thallic oxide in sal-ammoniac. By the action of water it is again resolved into thallic oxide and sal-ammoniac.

thāl-lō-chlōre, s. [Gr. thallos=a green bud, and chlōros=green.]

Chem.: A name applied by Knop and Schneder-mann to the green coloring matter of lichens, which they regard as different from ordinary chlorophyll. (Watts.)

thāl-lō-gēn, s. [Gr. thallos=a young shoot, and gennāō=to produce.]

Bot. (pl.): A class of plants, the lowest of all in organization. They have no wood properly so called, but the stem and leaves are undistinguishable. There are no stomates or breathing pores and no tracheæ. They are mere masses of cells. Their reproduction is by a special disintegration and solidification of some part of their tissue spontaneously effected. Allies: Algae, Fungales, and Lichenales. (Lindley.)

thāl-lōg'-ēn-ōūs, a. [Eng. thallogen; -ous.]

Bot.: Of or belonging to the Thallogens.

thāl-lōid, a. [Eng. thall(us); -oid.]

Bot.: Resembling a thallus.

†thalloid-hepaticæ, s. pl.

Bot.: Hepaticæ having a thallus, as distinguished from those which have leaves. They possess a well marked epidermis, having a few scattered stomates, and putting out rhizoids from its under side.

thāl-lō-phýte, s. [Gr. thallos=a young shoot, and phyton=a plant.]

Bot.: The same as THALLOGEN (q. v.).

Thaler.

bōl, bōy; pōut, jōwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, ðis; sin, aʒ; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f. -cian, -tian = shan. -tion, -sion = shūn; ðion, -sion = zhūn. -tious, -cious, -sious = shūs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bēl, dēl thāl-lūs (pl. thāl-lī), s. [Latin, from Greek thallos=a green bough.]

Botany:

1. The fusion of root, stem, and specially leaves, into one general mass.
2. The frond of Jungermanniaceæ and Hepaticæ.
3. The lobed frond of Lichens.
4. Any algal.
5. The bed of fibers from which many fungals spring. Called also Thalamus.

Thāl-mūd (Th as T), s. [TALMUD.]

thāl-ū-rā-nī-a, s. [Latin Thal(ia), and Urania.]

Ornith.: Wood-nymphs; a genus of Trochilidæ, with eleven species extending from Brazil to Ecuador, ranging northward as far as Costa Rica. Wings and tail of moderate size, the latter forked; bill moderate and slightly curved; tarsi clothed with feathers.

Thām-mūz, Tām-mūz, s. [Heb. hatammuz; Greek ho Thammous, both=the Tammuz; Vulg. Adonis.]

1. The tenth month of the Jewish civil year, containing twenty-nine days, and answering to a part of June and a part of July. The name was probably borrowed from the Syrian.

2. A word occurring once in the Old Testament, in a passage of extreme obscurity (Ezek. viii. 14), concerning which many conjectures have been made. The chief are: (1) That of Jerome, who records a tradition identifying Thammuz with Adonis. This opinion was adopted by Cornelius à Lapide, Osiander, Selden, Calmet, Gesenius, Ewald, &c. (2) That of Luther, who regarded Thammuz as a name of Bacchus; and (3) that of Calvin, who believed Thammuz to be the Egyptian Osiris. The opinion of Jerome is generally accepted. Milton, following Jerome, refers to the legend of the wounding and worship of Adonis or Thammuz, and the verse of Scripture, in these fine lines:

"The love tale
Infected Sion's daughters with like heat:
Whose wanton passions in the sacred porch
Ezekiel saw, when by the vision led,
His eye surveyed the dark idolatries Of alienated Judah." Paradise Lost, B. i., 446.

thām-nās-træ-a, subst. [Gr. thamnos=a bush, and Lat. astræa (q. v.).]

Palæont.: A genus of Actinozoa; twenty-seven species are in the British Jurassic, and three in the Upper Greensand. (Etheridge.)

thām-nī-ūm, s. [Gr. thamnos=a bush, a shrub.]

Bot.: The branched bush-like thallus of lichens.

thām-nō-bī-a, s. [Gr. thamnos=a bush, a shrub, and bios=life.]

Ornith.: A genus of Saxicolinæ, with ten species, from the Ethiopian region and India to the foot of the Himalayas.

thām-nō-cāl'-a-mūs, subst. [Lat. thamn(um)=a shrub, and calamus=a reed.]

Bot.: A genus of Bambusidæ. Thamnocalamus spathiflorus is a small bamboo, growing in the Himalayas, and yielding a fiber.

thām-nō-phile, s. [THAMNOPHILINÆ.]

Zoöl.: A member of the sub-family Thamnophilinæ (q. v.).

thām-nō-phī-lī-næ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. thamnophil(us); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -inæ.]

Ornith.: American Bush-shrikes; a sub-family of Formicariidæ, with ten genera, from the forest districts of equatorial America. Bill long, keel arched, tip hooked, base with bristles; wings moderate; tail long; tarsi broadly scaled; outer toe united to middle at base.

thām-nōph'-ī-lūs, s. [Gr. thamnos=a thicket, and phileō=to love.]

Ornithology: The type-genus of Thamnophilinæ (q. v.), with forty-seven species, from tropical America. Nostrils at side of base of bill, rounded and exposed; wings rounded, fourth to seventh quills longest; tarsi with transverse scales before and behind.

tha'-mŷn, s. [Native name.]

Zoöl.: Rucervus eldi, Eld's Deer, so called from Captain Eld, who discovered it in 1838. It abounds in the swamp lands of Burmah, and extends as far east as the island of Hainan. It differs from the Swamp Deer (q. v.), only in the form of its antlers, the royal being represented by a small snag.

thān, *thanne, *thēn, *thenne, *thon, *thonne, conj. [A. S. ðhonne=than; cogn. with Dut. dan=than, then; Goth. than=then, when; Ger. dann=then; denn=for, then, than; Lat. tum=then. Than is the same word as then, but differentiated in usage.] [THEN.] A particle used after certain adjectives and adverbs, expressing comparison or diversity, such as more, better, worse, rather, else, or the like, for the purpose of introducing the second member of the comparison. Than is usually followed by the object compared in the nominative case; as—

"What I should be, all but less than he Whom thunder hath made greater."
Milton: P. L., i. 257.

But sometimes the object compared is put in the objective case; as—

"Which when Beelzebub perceived—than whom,
Satan except, none higher sat—with grave Aspect he rose."
Milton: P. L., ii. 299.

In such cases than may be looked upon as a preposition. The second member or object of comparison is frequently a clause introduced by that; as, I had rather do this than that you should suffer; the that is frequently omitted; as—"I had rather glib myself than they Should not produce fair issue."

Shakesp.: Winter's Tale, ii. 1.

thān'-age (age as īg), s. [Eng. thane(e); -age.] The land granted to a thane; the district in which a thane resided; the dignity, office, or jurisdiction of a thane.

"Because perchance the heirs of the Thanes who anciently held the said Thanages."—Charter granted by David II.

thān'-a-ōs, subst. [Altered from Gr. thanatos=death.]

Entomology: A genus of Hesperidæ. One species, Thanaos tages, is common throughout temperate regions of Europe. The larva feeds on birds-foot trefoil.

†tha-nāt'-ī-čī, s. pl. [Gr. thanatikos=deadly.]

Med.: The term used by Dr. William Farr, in his Nosology, to indicate "lesions from violence tending to sudden death." These lesions are the direct results of physical or chemical forces, acting either by the will of the sufferer or of other persons, or accidentally.

thān'-a-tōid, adj. [Greek thanatos=death, and eidos=form, appearance.] Resembling death; apparently dead. (Dunghison.)

thān-a-tōl'-ō-gŷ, s. [Gr. thanatos=death, and logos=a word, a discourse.] A treatise on or the doctrine of death.

thān-āt-ō-phīd'-ī-a, subst. pl. [Greek thanatos=death, and Mod. Lat. ophidia (q. v.).]

Zoöl.: Poisonous Colubrine Snakes; a sub-order of Ophidia (q. v.), with two groups, Proteroglyphia and Solenoglyphia. (See these words.)

thāne, *thayne, *thein, s. [A. S. thegen, thegn, thēn=a thane; prop.=mature, grown up, from thigen, pa. par. of thēhan=to grow up, to be strong; cogn. with Icel. thegn; Ger. degen=a warrior, from gedigen, pa. par. of M. H. Ger. dihen; O. H. Ger. dihan; Ger. gedeihen=to grow up, to become mature.] [THEE, v.] A title of honor or dignity among the Anglo-Saxons. In England a freeman not noble was raised to the dignity of a thane by acquiring a certain amount of land (five hides in the case of a lesser thane), by making three sea voyages, or by receiving holy orders. The thanes had the right of voting in the Witenagemot, not only for their own shires, but also of the whole kingdom, on important questions. There were two orders of thanes: The king's thanes, or those who attended at his court and held lands immediately from him, and ordinary thanes, or lords of the manor, and who had a particular jurisdiction within their limits. On the cessation of his actual personal service about the king, the thane received a grant of land. After the Norman conquest, thanes and barons were classed together, and the title fell into disuse in the reign of Henry II. In Scotland, thane signified originally a count or earl, one who ruled a county, or even in some cases a province. Afterward the title was applied to a class of non-military tenants of the crown, and continued in use till the end of the fifteenth century.

"Of Fyfe Makduff that time the Thane," Wyntoun: Chronicle, VI. xix. 2.

thane-lands, s. pl. Lands granted to thanes.

thāne'-dōm, s. [Eng. thane; -dom.] The district or jurisdiction of a thane.

"In the thanedom once his own."
Scott: Lay of the Last Minstrel, v. 2.

thāne'-hood, s. [Eng. thane; -hood.]

1. The office, dignity, or position of a thane; thaneship.
2. The collective body of thanes; thanes in general.

thāne'-ship, subst. [Eng. thane; -ship.] The state, dignity, or position of a thane; thanehood.

Thanet-sands, s. pl.

Geol.: The lowest bed of the Lower Eocene of the London Basins resting immediately on the chalk. It has forty-five genera and seventy-three species of fossils. (Etheridge.)

thānk (pa. t. thanked, thanked*), v. t. [A. S. thancian, from thanc, thonc=thought, thanks; Dut. danken; Icel. thakka; Dan. takke; Sw. tacka; Ger. danken; Goth. thagkjan=to think.] [THANK, s.] To express gratitude to for a favor; to make acknowledgment of gratitude to for benefits, favors, or kindnesses.

"Thank him not for that which he doth say."
Shakesp.: Sonnet 79.

¶ (1) It is often used ironically.

"That Portugal hath yet no more than a suspension of arms, they may thank themselves, because they came so late into the treaty; and that they came so late, they may thank the Whigs, whose false representations they believed."—Swift.

(2) I thank you (commonly shortened into thank you): An expression of thanks for some kindness or act of politeness. It is also frequently used in declining an offer or request, whether seriously or ironically.

"No, I thank you, forsooth, heartily."—Shakesp.: Merry Wives, i. 1.

(3) I will thank you: A colloquial phrase of politeness used in introducing a request, and equivalent to, Will you oblige me by doing, giving, or handing so-and-so; as, I will thank you to shut the door.

thānk, s. [A. S. thanc, thonc=thought, grace, favor, content, thanks; allied to think; cogn. with Dut. dank; Icel. thökk; Dan. tak=thanks; tanke=thought; Sw. tack; Ger. dank; Goth. thagks.]

1. An expression of gratitude for a favor; an acknowledgment of gratitude for a benefit, favor, or kindness. (Now used exclusively in the plural.)

"Thanks be to God which giveth us the victory."—1 Corinth. xv. 57.

*2. Good-will, gratitude, thankfulness.

¶ (1) It is often used ironically.

"It is a sight but rarely spied, Thanks to man's wrath and woman's pride."
Scott: Rokeby, v. 6.

(2) Thanks; a common contraction for I give (offer, tender, &c.) thanks, thanks be to you, or the like.

¶ Thank you ma'ams: Hollows or depressions in a road, so called because as a vehicle plunges into them they cause involuntary bending of the body as in courtesying. (U. S. Colloq.)

thank-offering, s. An offering made as an expression of gratitude or thanks; an offering for benefits received.

"The altars ran with the blood of victims killed as thank-offerings."—Elton: Origins of Eng. Hist., p. 261.

thank-worthiness, s. The quality or state of being thankful.

thank-worthy, *thanke-worthy, adj. Deserving or worthy of thanks. (1 Peter ii. 19.)

thānk'-fūl, *thanke-full, adj. [A. S. thancful, thoncful.]

1. Impressed with a sense or feeling of gratitude for benefits or kindness received; grateful.

"One act, that from a thankful heart proceeds, Excels ten thousand mercenary deeds."

Couper: Truth, 223.

Chānk'-less, *thanke-lesse, *thank-lesse, a. [Eng. thank; -less.]

1. Unthankful, ungrateful; insensible of kindness or benefits.

"How sharper than a serpent's tooth it is,
To have a thankless child."

Shakesp.: Lear, i. 2.

2. Not deserving thanks; not likely to gain thanks.

"Calling the managing of state matters and common weal a thankless intermeddling in other mens affairs."—P. Holland: Plutarch, p. 78.

thānk'-less-ly, adv. [Eng. thankless; -ly.] In a thankless manner; without thanks; ungratefully.

"Whose sacred influence, spread through earth and We all too thanklessly participate." [heaven, Wordsworth: Excursion, bk. vii.]

thānk'-less-ness, s. [Eng. thankless; -ness.] The quality or state of being thankless; ingratitude; insensibility of kindness or benefits.

"Not t' have written then, seems little less Than worst of civil vices, thanklessness."

Donne: To Countess of Bedford.

thānk'-ly, adv. [Eng. thank; -ly.] Thankfully.

"He giveth frankly what we thankly spend."
Sylvester: Du Bartas, Third Day, First Week, 809.

thānks'-give, v. t. [Eng. thanks; -give.] To celebrate or distinguish by solemn rites in token of thankfulness; to give thanks for.

"To thanksgive or besse a thing in a way to a sacred ness he took to be an offering of it to God."—Mede.

thānks'-giv-ēr, s. [Eng. thanks, and giver.] One who gives thanks; one who acknowledges a kindness or benefit.

"The devout thanksgiver, David, continually declaring the great price he set upon the divine favors."—Barrow: Sermons, vol. i., ser. 8.

thānks'-giv-ing, *thankes-gyv-yng, s. [Eng. thanks, and giving.]

1. The act of rendering or returning thanks or of expressing gratitude for benefits or kindness.

"The aged have had longer experience of God's mercies than others, to furnish matter for thanksgivings."—Secker: Sermons, vol. ii., ser. 6.

2. A public celebration or acknowledgment of divine goodness; a day specially set apart for religious services as an acknowledgment of the goodness of God as shown either in any remarkable deliverance from calamity or in the ordinary dispensation of His bounties.

¶ The first day of national Thanksgiving ever observed in the United States was set apart in the following proclamation issued by President George Washington on the 3d of October, 1789.

"Whereas it is the duty of all nations to acknowledge the Providence of Almighty God, to obey his will, to be grateful for his benefits, and humbly to implore his protection and favor; and whereas both houses of Congress have by their joint committee requested me 'To recommend to the people of the United States a day of public thanksgiving and prayer, to be observed by acknowledging with grateful hearts the many signal favors of Almighty God, especially by affording them an opportunity peaceably to establish a form of government for their safety and happiness:'

"Now, therefore, I do recommend and assign Thursday, the 26th day of November next, to be devoted by the people of these States to the service of that great and glorious Being who is the beneficent author of all the good that was, that is, or that ever will be." [Then follow the specific subjects for Thanksgiving and prayer recommended by the President, viz., Thanksgiving for protection previous to becoming a nation; the course and conclusion of the late war; tranquility, union, and plenty; the Constitution of Government, particularly the National one; civil and religious liberty; the means of acquiring and diffusing useful knowledge; and for all the great and various favors vouchsafed;—also, that the people unite in prayer and supplication to the Great Ruler of the Nations.]

The practice of observing a day of thanksgiving originated, at an early date, in the New England colonies, was made national in the above proclamation, and, after a period of sectional neglect, was again revived and made national under President Lincoln.

3. A form of words expressive of thanks to God, as a grace or the like.

"In the thanksgiving before meat."

Shakesp.: Measure for Measure, i. 2.

thān'-nah, s. [Hind.] [TANNA.]

thāp'-sī-a, s. [Lat., from Gr. thapsia.]

Bot.: Deadly-carrot; the typical genus of Thapsidæ (q. v.). Perennial herbs with doubly or trebly pinnate leaves, and large compound umbels of yellow flowers, without involucre or involucel. T. garganica is found in the South of Europe and Northern Africa; T. silphion is a variety of it rather than a distinct species. [LASER.] Thapsia is a powerful rubefacient, and is used in medicine in the form of a sparadrap.

thāp'-sī-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. thapsia]; Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -ideæ.]

Bot.: A family of Apiaceæ.

thar, v. impers. [For tharf, from A. S. thearfan = to have need.] It behooves.

thār'-and-ite, s. [After Tharand, near Dresden, where found; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A variety of dolomite (q. v.), occurring in greenish-yellow crystals, which contain 4 per cent. of protoxide of iron.

thar'-bō-rōugh (gh silent), s. [A corrupt. of thirdborough (q. v.).] (Shakesp.: Love's Labor's Lost, i. 1.)

tharf, *tharffe, a. [THERF.]

tharm, *tharme, *thearm, s. [A. S. thearm; Icel. tharmr; Dut. & Ger. darm=a gut.]

*1. An intestine, a gut.

"Summe thay stykede thorgh guttes and thearmes."
Sir Ferumbas, 787.

2. Guts or intestines twisted into a cord, as for fiddle-strings, &c. (Prov.)

thāt, a., pron., conj., & adv. [A. S. dhæt, sing. neut. of demonstrative pronoun, frequently used as neut. of the def. article. The suffix t is the mark of the neuter gender, as in what, from who, it (orig. hit) from he, and answers to the Lat. d, as in istud, quid, id, &c. It also appears in Sansc. tat=it, that, and in the nomin. neut. and oblique cases of the Greek article. Cf. Dut. de (masc. & fem.)=the; dat=that (conj.); Icel. that=the; Dan. den (masc. & fem.), det (neut.)=the; Sw. den (masc. & fem.), det (neut.)=this; Ger. der (masc.), die (fem.), das (neut.)=the; dass=that (conj.); Goth. thata, neut. of def. article; Russ. tote (masc.), ta (fem.), to (neut.)=that.]

A. As adjective:

I. Used as a definite adjective before a noun:

1. Used to point to a person or thing before mentioned, or supposed to be understood; or used to designate a specific person or thing emphatically, having more force than the definite article, which may, however, in some cases be substituted for it.

"The woman was made whole from that hour."—Matthew ix. 22.

2. Used in opposition or contradistinction to this, and designating one of two objects already mentioned, and generally the one more remote in time or place. [II. 2.]

"This clerke said ye, that other naie."

Gower. C. A. (Prol.)

3. Used almost as equivalent to such, and serving to point not so much to persons or things as to their qualities; occasionally followed by as or that as a correlative.

"Whose love was of that dignity That it went hand in hand even with the vow."

Shakesp.: Hamlet, i. v.

II. Used absolutely or without a noun:

1. Used to designate a person or thing already mentioned, referred to, implied, or otherwise indicated.

"The measure is English heroic verse without rhyme, as that of Homer in Greek, and of Virgil in Latin."—Milton: P. L. (The Verse.)

2. Used in opposition to this, or by way of distinction; as, this is dark, that fair. When this and that are used to refer to persons or things already mentioned or indicated in any way, this designates the latter or last mentioned, that the former or first mentioned, in the same manner as the Lat. hic and ille, and the Fr. ceci and cela. When used to denote plural nouns that takes the plural form those.

"Those are the very words."

Shakesp.: Merchant of Venice, iv. 1.

3. Used in place of a sentence, or part of a sentence, or a series of sentences.

"When Moses heard that he was content."—Leviticus x. 20.

Here that refers to the words of Aaron (Lev. x. 19). That in this use sometimes precedes the sentence or clause to which it refers.

"That be far from thee, to do after this manner, to slay the righteous with the wicked."—Genesis xviii. 25.

Here that refers to the clause in italics. That is also frequently used as a substitute for an adjective: as, "You say he is dead; that he is not." It is also frequently used to explain or add to something said or referred to.

"I heard a humming,

And that a strange one."

Shakesp.: Tempest, ii. 1.

Sometimes it is used as equivalent to the modern colloquial use of so, as—

"You saw the ceremony?"

"That I did."—Shakesp.: Henry VIII., iv. 1.

4. Used with a predicate, by way of emphatic approbation, applause, or encouragement.

"Why, that's my dainty Ariel!"

Shakesp.: Tempest, v. 1.

5. Especial, distinguished.

"Art thou that my lord Elijah?"—1 Kings xviii. 7.

6. By omission of the following relative.

(1) Equivalent to he who, she who.

"Who is that calls so coldly?"—Shakesp.: Taming of the Shrew, iv. 1.

(2) Equivalent to what, that which.

"Have you that I sent you for?"

Shakesp.: Comedy of Errors, iv. 4.

B. As a relative pronoun, that is used frequently as equivalent to who or which.

"So being that ruling engine that governs the world, it both claims and finds as great a preeminence above all other kinds of knowledge as government is above contemplation."—South: Sermons, vol. i., ser. 9.

It cannot, however, be used as a relative with a preposition preceding it; but it may be so used if the preposition is placed at the end of the clause. Thus, we can say: The man of whom I spoke, or, the man that I spoke of; the house in which I live, or, the house that I live in, &c. That introduces always an adjective clause, while who or which are not always so used. To the relative use of that may be referred the cases in which it is used as correlative to so and such.

"Whose state is such that cannot choose

But lend and give where she is sure to lose."

Shakesp.: All's Well that Ends Well, i. 3.

C. As conjunction:

1. Used to introduce a clause which is, logically, either the subject of the principal sentence, or the object, or a necessary complement of an essential part of the principal sentence.

"'Tis childish error that they are afraid."

Shakesp.: Venus and Adonis, 898.

2. Used to introduce a reason; in that, because, since.

"Do not smile at me that I boast her off."

Shakesp.: Tempest, iv. 1.

3. Used to denote a purpose, object, or end; equivalent to the phrases in order that, so that, to the end that.

4. Used to introduce a result or consequence, and equivalent to so that.

"At this Adonis smiles as in disdain,

That in each cheek appears a pretty dimple."

Shakesp.: Venus and Adonis, 242.

5. Denoting a fact supposed to be in connection with what precedes; equivalent to seeing that, it being the case that.

"There is something in the wind that we cannot get in."

Shakesp.: Comedy of Errors, iii. 1.

6. Supplying the place of a relative preceded by a preposition. [B.]

"This is the hour that Madam Silvia Entreated me to call."

Shakesp.: Two Gentlemen, iv. 3.

*7. Used to supply the place of another conjunction in the second part of a clause.

"As if the world should cleave, and that slain men Should solder up the rift."

Shakesp.: Antony and Cleopatra, iii. 4.

8. Added to other conjunctions and relative adverbs without modifying their sense.

"After that the holy rites are ended."

Shakesp.: Much Ado about Nothing, v. 4.

So also we find lest that, when that, where that, while that, &c.

9. Used elliptically to introduce a sentence or clause expressive of surprise indignation, or the like.

"That a brother should Be so perfidious!"

Shakesp.: Tempest, i. 2.

¶ In that: For the reason that; seeing that; because.

10. Used similarly elliptically as an optative particle, or to introduce a phrase expressing a wish.

"O, that you bore

The mind that I do."

Shakesp.: Tempest, ii. 1.

D. As adv.: To such a degree; so; as, He was that angry. (Vulgar.)

thātch, substantive. [A weakened form of thak [THACK, s.], from A. S. thæc=thatch; theccan=to thatch, cover; Dut. dak=thatch, dekken=to thatch; Icel. thak=thatch, thekja=to thatch; Dan. tag=thatch, tække=to thatch; Sw. tak=thatch; täkke=to thatch; Ger. dach=thatch, decken=to thatch. From the same root come Gr. tegos=a roof, stegō=to cover; Lat. tego=to cover; Irish teagh=a house; Gael. teach, tigh=a house; Welsh tig=a house, toi=to thatch; Eng. deck (1), s.]

thatch-tree, s. A general name for palms in the West Indies.

thatch-wood work, s.

Hydr. Eng.: A mode of facing sea-walls with brushwood. Underbrush of say twelve or fourteen years' growth is cut down, fagoted at its full length, and spread over the face of the banks. It is kept down by strong stakes, which have cross-pins at their upper ends to rest upon the brush, which breaks and disperses the waves and protects the earth beneath.

thatch, v. t. [THATCH, s.] To cover with straw, rushes, reeds, or the like.

thatched, pa. par. or a. [THATCH, v.]

thatched-head, subst. One who has a head of thickly-matted hair.

thatch-ēr, s. [Eng. thatch, v.; -er.] One whose occupation is to thatch houses.

"An honest thatcher will know how to hand his straw no whit better after his election than he did before."—Ep. Hall: Episcopacy by Divine Right, pt. iii., § 6.

thatch-īng, pr. par., a. & s. [THATCH, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As substantive:

1. The act or art of covering with thatch.
2. The materials, as straw, reeds, &c., used for thatching; thatch.

thatching-fork, thatching-spale, subst. An implement with a forked blade and a cross handle at one end for thrusting home the tufts of straw in thatching. The blade is usually formed of ash-wood, but sometimes of thin iron.

thāt-nēss, s. [Eng. that; -ness.] The state or condition of being that rather than this. [THIS-NESS.]

thatte, pron., conjunct., &c. [THAT.]

thāught (gh silent), s. [A corrupt. of thwart.] A bench in a boat on which the rowers sit.

thāu-mān-tī-ās, s. [Gr. thauma (genit. thau-matos)=a wonder.]

Zoöl.: A genus of Medusidæ. Body hemispherical, its circumference with tentaculiform cirrhi, bulbous at their root, the under part of the animal much excavated, with a stomachical cavity terminating by a buccal orifice. From the European and Australian coasts.

thāu-mās, s. [Gr. thauma=a marvel.]

Palæont.: The name given to some extinct forms from the Oolite, closely allied to Rhina squatina, the Angel-fish, and probably to be classed with the Rhinidæ.

thāu-mā-sīte, s. [Greek thaumazō=to be surprised; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: An amorphous mineral occurring in crevices in the Bjelke mine, Jemtland, Sweden. When first found it is stated to be soft, hardening on exposure. Hardness, 3½; specific gravity, 1.877; luster, greasy to dull; color, white. Composition: A mean of three very concordant analyses appears to justify the formula suggested by Lindström, $\text{CaSiO}_3 + \text{CaCO}_3 + \text{CaSO}_4 + 14 \text{ aq.}$, which needs silica, 9.93; carbonic acid, 7.28; sulphuric acid, 13.25; lime, 27.82; water, 41.72=100. In view of the improbable composition, it has been attempted to show that the substance is a mixture; but by independent microscopic investigation its practically homogeneous structure has been confirmed. Still further examination is essential.

thāu-mās-tūr-ā, s. [Gr. thaumastos=wonderful, and oura=a tail.]

Ornith.: Sheartail; a genus of Trochilidæ, with two species, from the humid districts of Peru. The genus is distinguished by the peculiarly-shaped tail, the feathers of which are pointed, the middle ones being greatly elongate. Several pairs are generally met with together. The males are extremely pugnacious, driving off every other kind of humming-bird which ventures to enter their territory. The plumage of the sexes is different, the female being much duller in color.

thāu-mā-tōl-ā-trỹ, subst. [Gr. thauma (genit. thau-matos)=a wonder, and latreia=worship.] Excessive admiration for what is wonderful; admiration of what is miraculous.

thāu-mā-trōpe, s. [Gr. thauma=a wonder, and tropē=a turning; trepō=to turn.] An optical toy, depending for its effects upon the persistence of vision. It consists of a circular card having strings fastened to it at the extremities of a diameter. On one side is drawn some object, as a horse, and on the other his rider, so that when the card is twirled rapidly round the rider appears to be seated on the horse.

thāu-mā-tūrge, s. [THAUMATURGY.] A dealer in miracles; a miracle-monger.

thāu-mā-tūr-gic, thāu-mā-tūr-gic-al, adj. [Eng. thaumaturg(y); -ic, -ical.] Of or pertaining to thaumaturgy, magic, or legerdemain.

"[To see] such pleasant peeces of perspective, Indian pictures made of feathers, China workes, frames, thaumaturgicall motions, exoticke toyes, &c."—Burton: Anat. of Melancholy, p. 275.

thāu-mā-tūr-gics, s. pl. [THAUMATURGIC.] Feats of magic or legerdemain.

thāu-mā-tūr-gist, s. [Eng. thaumaturg(y); -ist.] One who deals in wonders or believes in them; a wonder-worker.

"Cagliostro, thaumaturgist, prophet, and archquack."—Carlyle: Diamond Necklace, ch. xvi.

thāu-mā-tūr-gūs, s. [Gr. thaumatourgos, from thauma=a wonder, and ergon=work.] A miracle-worker; a title given by Roman Catholics to some of their saints, specially noted for working miracles; as, Gregory Thaumaturgus (212-270). St. Bernard of Clairvaux (1091-1153) is called the Thaumaturgus of the West.

thāu-mā-tūr-gỹ, s. [Gr. thaumatourgia, from thauma (genit. thau-matos)=a wonder, and ergon=work.] The act of performing miracles or wonders; wonder-working, magic, legerdemain.

thāve, s. [THEAVE.]

thāw, thow-en, v. i. & t. [A. S. thawian, thawan; cogn. with Dut. dooijen=to thaw, from dooi=thaw; Icel. theyja=to thaw, from thá=a thaw; Dan. tøe=to thaw, from tø=a thaw; Sw. töa=to thaw, from tö=a thaw; Ger. thauen=to thaw.]

A. Intransitive:

I. Literally:

1. To melt, dissolve, or become liquid, as ice or snow.

"Long, tedious courtship may be proper for cold countries, where their frosts are long a thawing; but heav'n be praised, we live in a warm climate."—Dryden: An Evening's Love, i. 2.

2. To become so warm as to melt ice or snow. (Said of the weather, and used impersonally.)

II. Fig.: To become less cold, reserved, or formal; to become more genial.

B. Transitive:

1. Lit.: To melt, to dissolve, as ice or snow; to free from frost, as frozen ground.

"Time, never wandering from his annual round, Bids zephyr breathe the spring and thaw the ground."
Cowper: Elegy v. (Trans.)

2. Fig.: To render less cold, formal, or reserved; to make more genial.

thāw, s. [THAW, v.]

I. Literally:

1. The reduction of snow or ice to a liquid state by the increasing heat of the sun, or by the accidental passage of warmer currents over the frozen mass. The dissolution of the ice particles in the atmosphere creates a humidity which is perceptibly felt. During thaw there is a sensation of greater cold than during the previous frost, owing apparently to caloric being carried away from the body by the evaporation of the moisture on the skin.

2. Warmth of weather, such as liquefies or melts things frozen.

"They soon after, with great joy, saw the snow fall in large flakes from the trees, a certain sign of an approaching thaw."—Cook: First Voyage, bk. i., ch. iv.

II. Fig.: The state of becoming less cold, formal, or reserved.

"But were a man in a mountain of ice, yet, if the Sun of Righteousness should arise upon him, his frozen heart shall feel a thaw."—Bunyan: Pilgrim's Progress, pt. ii.

thāw-lēss, a. [Eng. thaw; -less.] Unthawed, unthawing.

"The pure air, even on this lower edge of a thousand feet above sea, cherishes their sweetest scents and liveliest colors, and the winter gives them rest under thawless serenity of snow."—Ruskin, in St. James's Gazette, Feb. 9, 1886.

thāw-ỹ, a. [Eng. thaw; -y.] Growing liquid; thawing.

thē, def. art. [A. S. dhe, more commonly se, the masc. nom. of the definite article: se, seo, dheot [THAT]; O. Sax. dhe; O. Fris. the, thi; Dut. & Low German de; Sw. & Dan. den; Ger. der. The A. S. definite article was inflected like an adjective for number, gender, and case. The, before a comparative, is the old instrumental thi; as, the more=Lat. eo magis.]

1. Used before nouns with a specifying and limiting force; as, the twelve apostles; The sun is the source of light and heat.

2. Used before a noun in the singular number, to denote a species by way of distribution or a single thing representing the whole; as, The grasshopper shall be a burden.

3. Used before abstract nouns; seemingly used in a general sense, but in fact restricted by their particular application.

"The grand debate,
The popular harangue, the tart reply,
The logic, and the wisdom, and the wit,
And the loud laugh—I long to know them all;
I burn to set th' imprisoned wranglers free,
And give them voice and utt'rance once again."
Cowper: Task, iv. 30-34.

4. Used before proper names by way of emphatic distinction, or before family names with something of the force of a title; as, The Macnab, The O'Donoghue, The O'Connor Don, &c.

5. Prefixed to adjectives used absolutely, giving them the force and functions of abstract names; as, the sublime, the beautiful, the real, the ideal, &c.

6. Used before adjectives and adverbs in the comparative degree, with the force of by that, by so much, by how much, on that account; as, the sooner the better.

¶ In this country some writers and speakers improperly use the definite article after the manner of the French idiom before diseases, &c.; as, He died of the smallpox.

the, v. i. [THEE, v.] To thrive, to prosper; to have good luck.

"So the ik," quod he."—Chaucer: C. T., 3,862.

thē-ā, s. [Chinese tcha=tea.]

Bot.: Tea; a genus of Ternströmiaceæ. Flowers pendent; sepals five, persistent, with bracts at their base; petals five, seven, or eight, the inner series the larger one; stamens in two rows, the inner or free series as many as the petals; styles three; fruit three-celled, capsular, spheroidal, with each cell usually one-seeded, the capsule ultimately splitting through the cells into three valves, each with a partition down the middle. Known species six, the leaves of only one of which are made into tea. [TEA-PLANT.] Griffith considered the genus not to be properly distinct from Camellia, which, however, has the sepals numerous and deciduous, the free stamens twice as many as the petals, five as the normal number of styles, and flowers erect. Most modern botanists therefore keep the two genera separate.

thē-ā-çē-æ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. the(a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -aceæ.]

Bot.: Mirbel's name for Ternströmiaceæ (q. v.).

T'-head, subst. [Eng. T, and head.] A cross-bar with two prongs on the end of a dog-chain, watch-chain, or elsewhere, to engage in a ring.

thē-ād, s. [Mod. Lat. the(a); Eng. suff. -ad.]

Bot. (pl.): The Ternströmiaceæ. (Lindley.)

thē-ān-drīc, a. [Gr. theandrikos, from theos=God, and anēr (genit. andros)=a man.] Relating to or existing by the union of divine and human operation in Jesus Christ, or the joint agency of the divine and human nature.

Theol.: A term introduced in the seventh century to express that unity of operation in the two natures and the two wills of our Lord Jesus Christ, by which they act as the natures and wills of one indivisible Person, God and Man. (Blunt.) thē-ān-thrōp-īc, thē-ān-thrōp-īc-al, a. [Gr. theos=God, and anthrōpos=a man.] Partaking both of the divine and human nature.

thē-ān-thrō-pīsm, s. [THEANTHROPIC.]

1. A state of being both God and man.
2. A conception of God or of gods, as possessing qualities essentially the same as those of men, but on a grander scale. (Gladstone.) thē-ān-thrō-pīst, s. [THEANTHROPISM.] One who advocates or believes in Theanthropism.

thē-ān-thrō-pỹ, s. [THEANTHROPISM.] The same as Theanthropism.

thē-arch-īc, a. [THEARCHY.] Divinely sovereign or supreme.

thē-ar-chỹ, s. [Greek theos=God, and archē=rule.]

1. Government by God; theocracy.
2. A body of divine rulers; an order or system of gods or deities.

thē-ā-tēr, thē-ā-tre (tre as tēr), teatre, s. [Fr. théâtre, from Latin theatrum; Gr. theatron=a place for seeing shows; theamai=to see; thea=a sight; Sp., Port. & Ital. teatro.]

I. Literally:

1. A building devoted to the representation of dramatic spectacles; a play-house. Among the Greeks and Romans theaters were the chief public edifices next to the temples, and many of them were of enormous size. The theater of Marcellus at Rome, the external walls of which are still in existence, contained seats for 30,000 spectators. The Greek theaters were semicircular; that part in which the chorus danced and sang was called the orchestra; behind this, and facing the audience, was the stage for the performers who took part in the drama; the back of the stage being filled in by a permanent architecturally decorated scene. Roman theaters also formed semi-circles with seats rising in the form of an amphitheater for the spectators, at the chord of which was the stage (scena), with its permanent decorations. The orchestra, which was the space between the stage and the lowest tier of spectators, was employed by the Greeks for theatrical purposes, whereas the Romans turned it into seats for the senators. The top-most tier was generally crowned with a covered portico. The whole mass of the rows of seats was supported by a solid substructure of piers and arches, which formed passages of three stories one above another, retaining the circular form of the building; while externally they formed arcades, which were surrounded with half-columns or piers with entablatures over them. The exterior of the straight portion of the building, which contained the stage and some chambers connected with it, was generally surrounded by a portico. The theaters were either open, or were protected against the sun and rain by an awning stretched over them. The scena consisted of the scena in a restricted sense, answering to the modern scene, and the pulpitum or stage. The scene itself, in accordance with a critical canon observed with much solicitude by the Grecian dramatists, was very rarely changed during the course of the same play, although the scena versatilis, the turning scene, and the scena ductilis, the shifting scene, were not altogether unknown. The pulpitum again was divided into the proscenium, or space in front of the scene, where the actors stood while actually engaged in the business of the play, and the postscenium, or space behind the scene, to which they retired when they made their exits. Modern theaters are generally constructed on a semicircular or horse-shoe plan, with galleries running round the walls. The portion of a modern theater corresponding to the ancient orchestra is occupied mainly by spectators, the orchestra taking up only a small part of it next to the stage.

Theater of Dionysos.

"The building was a spacious theater,
Half-round on two main pillars vaulted high,
With seats where all the lords and each degree
Of sort, might sit in order to behold."

Milton: Samson Agonistes, 1,605.

2. A room, hall, or other place, generally with a platform at one end, and ranks of seats, rising as they recede, or otherwise arranged so as to afford the spectators a full and unobstructed view of the platform. Such rooms are used for public lectures, anatomical demonstrations, surgical operations &c.

II. Figuratively:

1. A place rising by steps or gradations like the seats in a theater.

"Shade above shade, a woody theater Of stateliest view." Milton: P. L., iv. 141.

2. A place, scene, or sphere of action or exhibition; a scene or field of operations; the scene or locality where a series of events takes place; as, the theater of war.

Thē'-a-tine, †Thē'-a-tin, *Tē'-a-tin, a. & s. [See def. B.]

A. As adj.: Of, belonging to, or connected with the congregation described under B.

"The Theatine Nuns were founded by the Blessed Ursula Benincasa . . . she died in 1618."—Addis and Arnold: Cath. Dict., p. 792.

B. As substantive:

Church Hist.: Any member of a congregation of Regular Clerks, which derived its name from Theate (now Chieti), a fortified city of the Abruzzo, of which John Peter Caraffa, one of the founders of the Congregation, was Bishop. Associated with Caraffa, were St. Cajetan, Paul Consiglieri, and Boniface de Colle; the first steps toward the formation of the new congregation were taken in 1524, and in the following year it was approved by Pope Clement VII. The object of the founders was the promotion of spiritual life among Christians and the removal of irregularities among the secular clergy. The members took the three vows, and practiced rigid poverty, for they even abstained from asking alms. In the papedom of Caraffa, who was elected in 1555, and took the title of Paul IV., the congregation spread over the Continent, but is at present confined to Italy.

thē'-a-tral, thē'-ā'-tral, adj. [Fr., from Latin theatralis.] Pertaining or belonging to a theater or theaters; theatrical.

"In theatral actions he personates Herod in his majesty."—Comment. on Chaucer (ed. 1665), p. 23.

thē-āt'-rō-phōne, s. [Eng. theatr(e), and Gr. phōne=sound.] An automatic telephone by which connection with a theater can be secured by dropping a coin in a slot.

thēave, thāve, s. [Cf. Welsh dafad=a sheep, a ewe.] A ewe of the first year.

thē-bā'-i-a, s. [THEBAINE.]

thē-bā'-id, s. [See def.] A poem concerning Thebes. There were several such, but the name was given, by way of preeminence, to a Latin heroic poem in twelve books written by Statius, born A. D. 61, died A. D. 96.

thē-bā'-ine, s. [Named from Thebes, in Egypt, from the vicinity of which comes some of the opium of commerce.]

Chem.: C₁₉H₂₁NO₃. Thebaia. One of the less important bases existing in opium. Obtained by treating the extract of opium with milk of lime, washing the precipitate with water, and after drying, exhausting it with boiling alcohol. On evaporation a residue is obtained, from which ether dissolves out the thebaine. It crystallizes from alcohol in quadratic tablets, having a silvery luster, tastes acrid, and is extremely poisonous. It melts at 125°, is insoluble in water, very soluble in alcohol and ether, and is colored deep red with sulphuric acid.

Thē'-ban, a. & s. [See def.]

A. As adj.: Pertaining or relating to Thebes.

B. As subst.: A native or inhabitant of Thebes.

Theban-legion, s. [THUNDERING-LEGION, 2.]

Theban-year, s.

Ancient Chron.: The Egyptian year, which consisted of 365 days 6 hours.

thē-bō-lāc'-tic, a. [Eng. theb(ain); o connect., and lactic.] Derived from or pertaining to thebain and lactic acid.

thebolactic-acid, s.

Chem.: C₃H₅O₃. An acid isomeric or identical with lactic, and found in the mother liquors of morphine. It is said that some of its salts differ from those of ordinary lactic acid. Turkey opium yields about two per cent. as lactate of calcium.

thē'-cā, s. [Lat., from Gr. thēkē=a case, a box, a chest.]

1. Anat.: A sheath, specif. applied to the sheath inclosing the spinal cord, formed by the dura mater.

†2. Botany:

(1) An anther. (Grew.)

(2) Used in the plural of (a) the sporangia, capsules, or conceptacles of ferns; (b) the sporangia or capsules of mosses; (c) the sporangia, folliculi, or involucre of Equisetaceae; (d) the sporocarpia, conceptacles, or capsules of Lycopodiaceae; and (e) the asci of Lichens and Fungals.

3. Palaeont.: A genus of Hyaleidae. Shell straight, conical, tapering to a point, back flattened, aperture trigonal. Possibly a sub-genus of Orthoceras. Forty species; from the Palaeozoic Rocks.

4. Zoöl.: A sheath or receptacle; specif., the wall of a sclerodermic corallum. In some cases it is strengthened by an epitheca.

thē-cāç'-ēr-a, s. [Gr. thēkē=sheath, and keras a horn.]

Zoöl.: A genus of Doridae (q. v.), with two species, from a quarter to half an inch long.

thē-cā-dāc'-tŷl, sub. [THECADACTYLUS.] Any individual of the genus Thecadactylus (q. v.).

†thē-cā-dāc'-tŷl'-ūs, s. [Ger. thēkē=a case, and dactylos=a finger.]

Zoöl.: A genus of Geckotidae, or a sub-genus of Gecko (q. v.). Toes half-webbed, no femoral pores, tail uniformly granular.

thē'-cāl, a. [THECA.] Of or pertaining to a theca.

thē-cāph'-ōr-a, sub. pl. [Latin theca, and Gr. phoros=bearing.]

Zoöl.: The same as SERTULARIDA. (Hincks.)

thē'-cā-phōre, s. [THECAPHORA.]

Bot.: The stalk of an ovary; spec., the long stalk supporting the ovary in Passiflora, &c. Called also Gynophore, Basigynium, and Podogynium.

thē'-cā-spōre, sub. [Lat. theca, and Gr. sporos, spora=a seed.]

Bot. (pl.): Spores in asci, ascospores, and endospores. So named to distinguish them from Basidiospores or Stylospores.

thē'-cā-spōr-oūs, a. [Eng. thecaspore(e); -ous.] Of or pertaining to fungi which have their spores in thecae.

thē'-cī-a, s. [Modern Latin, from theca (q. v.).] [THECIDÆ.]

thē'-cī-dæ, s. pl.: [Mod. Lat. thec(ia); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Palaeont.: A family of Tabulata, with a single genus Thecia, confined to the Silurian. Corallum compound, septa present, tabulæ well developed. Its precise affinities are obscure, and it should probably be regarded as one of the Alcyonaria.

†thē'-cī-dī'-i-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. thecidi(um); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Zoöl. & Palaeont.: A family of Brachiopoda, now usually merged in Terebratulidae (q. v.).

thē'-cīd'-i-ūm, s. [Mod. Lat., dimin. from Gr. thēkē=a sheath.]

1. Bot.: Mirbel's name for an Achæmium (q. v.).

2. Zoöl. & Palaeont.: A genus of Terebratulidae, or Thecidiidae. Shell thickened, with granulated border; fixed to sea bottom by the substance of the beak of the ventral valve; structure punctated; oral processes united in the form of a bridge over the visceral cavity; curved arms folded upon themselves, and supported by a calcareous loop. One recent species, Thecidium radians, from the Mediterranean; fossil thirty-four, from the Trias onward.

thēc'-lā, subst. [Latin=a Christian martyr of unknown date.]

Entom.: Hairstreak; a genus of Lycenidae. Fore wings wholly dark brown, or with a large blotch of some other color, or with pale markings near the hinder margin; hind wings with a transverse pale line below, which is entire, interrupted, or nearly obsolete. Larvæ feeding on trees, shrubs, or papilionaceous plants. Common in all temperate regions. Thecla rubi, the Green Hair-streak, has the under side of the wings green; the rest have not this character. T. betulae, the Brown Hair-streak, has the under side of the hind wings with two slender white streaks. T. pruni, the Dark Hair-streak, has an orange band with a row of black spots; T. album, the Black Hair-streak, a black line; and T. quercus, the Purple Hair-streak, has two small orange spots instead of the band. The first of the five is the most common.

†thē'-cō-dōnt, a. & s. [THECODONTIA.]

A. As adj.: Of or belonging to the Thecodontia (q. v.); having the teeth fixed in distinct sockets.

"In some respects the Thecodont Reptiles make an approach to the Lacertilians, while in others they approximate to the Deinosaurs. Upon the whole, however, they would seem to be best regarded as an ancient group of Amphicelion Crocodiles, distinguished by their compressed, trenchant, and serrated teeth."—Nicholson: Palæont., ii. 218.

B. As subst.: Any individual of the Thecodontia (q. v.).

†thē-cō-dōn'-ti-a (ti as shī), s. pl. [Gr. thēkē=a case, and odontos (genit. odontos)=a tooth.]

Palæont.: An order of Reptilia founded by Owen. Vertebral bodies biconcave; ribs of trunk long and bent, the anterior ones with a bifurcate head; limbs ambulatory, femur with a third trochanter; teeth with the crown more or less compressed, pointed, with trenchant and finely-serrate margins, implanted in distinct sockets. Two genera, Thecodontosaurus and Palæosaurus, from the Trias, near Bristol. (See extract under THECODONT, A.) Huxley regards them as Dinosaurian.

thē-cō-dōn-tō-sāu'-rūs, s. [Gr. thēkē=a case; odontos (genit. odontos)=a tooth, and sauros=a lizard.] [THECODONTIA.]

theft-ly, adverb. [Mid. Eng. theft=thief; -ly.] Like a thief; in the manner of a thief.

thēft, thēfte, s. [For theft, from A. S. thiefdhe, thēofdhe, thýfdhe, from thēof, thýof, thēf=a thief; thēofian=to steal; cogn. with O. Fris. thiufthe, from thiaf=a thief; Icel. thýfdh, thýft, from thjófr=a thief.]

1. The act of stealing or thieving. In law, the same as LARCENY (q. v.).

"His thefts were too open; his filching was like an unskilled singer, he kept not time."—Shakesp.: Merry Wives, i. 3.

*2. That which is stolen.

"If the theft be certainly found in his hand alive, whether ox, ass, or sheep, he shall restore double."—Exodus xxii. 4.

theft-bote, s.

Old Eng. Law: The receiving of a man's goods again from a thief, or a compensation for them by way of composition, and to prevent the prosecution of the thief.

"Of a nature somewhat similar to the two last species of offences, is theft-bote; which is where the party robbed not only knows the felon, but also takes his goods again, or other amends, upon agreement not to prosecute. This is frequently called compounding of felony; and formerly was held to make a man an accessory: but is now punished with fine and imprisonment. To advertise a reward for the return of things stolen, or lost, with no questions asked, or words to the same purport, subjects the advertiser and the printer or publisher to a forfeiture of £50 to any person who will sue for the same, who is entitled also to his full costs of suit."—Blackstone: Comment., bk. iv., ch. 10.

thēft'-u-ōūs, a. [Eng. theft; -uous.]

1. Lit.: Dishonest; inclined or inclining to acts of theft; involving theft.

2. Fig.: Hidden, sly, underhand.

"When you have read the article of greatest celebrity in the current number of a periodical, you find that there has been no other motive to it than a theftuous hope to amuse an hour for you after dinner by serving up to you again the plums from some book."—Masson: De Quincey; English Men of Letters, p. 138.

thē-gīth'-ēr, adv. [See def.] A Scotch form of Together (q. v.).

"This bed looks as if a' the colliers in Sangnhar had been in 't thegither."—Scott: Guy Mannering, ch. xlv.

thēgn (g silent), s. [THANE.]

thēgn'-hood (g silent), s. [THANEHOOD.]

thē'-ī-form, a. [Mod. Lat. thea, and Eng. form.] Having the form of tea.

thē'-ī-na, s. [THEINE.]

thē'-ine, s. [Mod. Lat. the(a); -ine.]

Chem.: $C_8H_{10}N_4O_2$. An organic base, occurring in tea leaves, in Paraguay tea, guarana, and in small quantities in cocoa seeds. It is also formed synthetically from theobromine by union with methyl, yielding methyl-theobromine, or theine. To prepare it from tea the leaves are extracted with hot water, the solution precipitated with lead acetate, and the filtrate freed from lead by sulphuric acid. On evaporation of the solution and allowing it to stand for some time, the theine crystallizes out. Purified by animal charcoal it forms tufts of white silky needles, slightly soluble in cold water and alcohol, melting at 225°, and subliming unchanged at a higher temperature. Tea leaves contain from two to four per cent. of theine, to which the stimulating effect of tea is partly ascribed.

thēī-ō-thēr'-mīn, s. [Gr. theion=sulphur; thermos=heat, and -in (Chem.).] [PLOMBIERIN.]

thēir, thair, thar, a. or poss. pron. [Orig. not a possessive pronoun, but the genit. plural of the definite article; from Icel. theirra; O. Icel. theirra=of them; A. S. dhēra, dhāra, genit. pl. of se or dhe=the; Ger. der, genit. plural of the definite article; Goth. thize, fem. thizo, genit. pl. of sa, so, thata=the. Hir, hire or here was formerly used for their, from A. S. hira=of them, genit. pl. of he=he.] [THAT, THEY.] Of or belonging to them; pertaining to them; as, their house, their land, their lives, &c.

thēirs, a. or pron. [Formed from their on analogy of ours, yours; cf. Dan. deres; Sw. deras=theirs.] Their. Like ours and yours, theirs may be used absolutely, and as a nominative, objective, or simple predicate.

thē'-īsm, s. [Gr. thēos=a god; Fr. théisme.]

1. The belief in a God, as distinguished from atheism. In this sense Christians, Jews, Mohammedans, &c., are all theists. Etymologically viewed, theists (from the Greek) and deism (from the Latin) both mean belief in a God. In the early part of the seventeenth century the word Deism fell into some discredit, and after a time the term Theism was used in its stead. [DEIST, DEISM.]

2. The belief in a God and in natural religion combined with disbelief in revelation. [THEISTIC-CHURCH.]

thē'-ist, s. [Gr. theism; Fr. théiste.] A believer in the existence of a God, as opposed to an atheist.

"The word deist, or theist, in its original signification, implies merely the belief of a God, being opposed to atheist; and so there may be deists of various kinds."—Waterland: Christianity Vindicated, p. 62.

thē'-ist'-ic, thē'-ist'-ic-āl, a. [Eng. theist; -ic, -ical.] Pertaining to theism or theists; according to the doctrines of theists.

"From an abhorrence of superstition, he appears to have adopted the most distant extremes of the theistic system."—Warton: Life of Thomas Pope, p. 208.

Theistic Church, s.

Church Hist.: A Church founded in London in 1871 for the purpose of promulgating the theistic views of the Rev. Mr. C. Voysey, "which the decision of the Privy Council (1870) has debarred him from preaching as vicar of Healaugh." Among the promoters were many eminent men, notably Dr. Patrick Black, Sir John Bowring, Charles Darwin, Sir Charles Lyell, Andrew Pritchard, Judge Stansfeld, the Right Rev. Samuel Hinds, formerly Bishop of Norwich, and many others. Their leading principles are:

1. That it is the right and duty of every man to think for himself in matters of religion.
2. That there is no finality in religious beliefs; that higher views of God are always possible.
3. That it is our duty to obtain the highest truth, and to proclaim it and to detect and controvert errors.
4. That religion is based on morality.
5. That Theism is not aggressive against persons, only against erroneous opinions.

Their belief may be summarized thus:

1. That there is one living and true God, and there is no other God beside Him.
2. That He is perfect in power, wisdom, and goodness, and therefore every one is safe in His everlasting care.
3. Therefore that none can ever perish or remain eternally in suffering or in sin, but all shall reach at last a home of goodness and blessedness in Him.

thē'-kēl, s. [Chilian name.]

Pharm.: The purgative diuretic infusion of the leaves of Chæradodia chilensis.

thē-lēph'-ōr-a, s. [Gr. thēlē=a teat, a nipple, and phoros=bearing.]

Botany: A genus of Auricularini, now limited to fungals, whose hymenium shows slight traces of papillæ or veins, and is confluent with the pileus, which is fibrous and has no cuticle. Found in the tropics of America.

Thēl'-lūs-sōn (Th as T), s. [See def. of compound.]

English Law: The Act 39 & 40 George III., c. 98, occasioned by the will of Peter Thellusson, who died in London July 21, 1798. He possessed £4,000 a year and £600,000 of personal property, and wished it to accumulate after his death for so long a time that it was calculated that it would have amounted to £18,000,000. The Act restricted such accumulations.

thē'-lō-dūs, s. [Gr. thēlē=a nipple, and odontos=a tooth.]

Palæont.: A provisional genus of Cestracionts, founded on shagreen scales from the Ludlow bone-bed.

thēl-phū'-sā, s. [Lat., from Gr. Telphousa=a nymph who gave her name to a town in Arcadia.]

Zoöl.: The type-genus of Thelphusidæ (q. v.). Carapace flat, smooth, broad, and heart-shaped; external antennæ very short, placed near footstalks of eyes. Thelphusa fluviatilis, the best-known species, is from the southeast of Europe.

thēl-phū'-sī-ān, s. [THELPHUSA.] Any individual of the Thelphusidæ (q. v.).

thēl-phū'-sī-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. thelphus(a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Zoöl.: A family of Brachyurous Crustaceæ. Carapace more or less oval; eye footstalks short, fourth joint of jaw feet not inserted into external angle of preceding joint. There are three or four genera, and most of the species are tropical or sub-tropical, and live in the earth near the banks of rivers or in humid forests, bearing a strong analogy to Land-crabs.

thē-lýg'-ō-nūm, s. [Lat. thelygonon; Gr. thēlygonon=a plant supposed to assist the procreation of females; thēlygonos=begetting girls; thēlys=female, and gonē=offspring.]

Bot.: A genus of Chenopodiaceæ. Only known species Thelygonum cynocrambe, the kynokrambē of Dioscorides, is a somewhat acrid plant, abounding in acicular saline crystals, and is slightly purgative. It is sometimes used as a potherb. It is a native of the countries bordering the Mediterranean.

thē-lý-mī'-tra, s. [Gr. thēlymitrēs=in woman's clothes; thēlys=female, and mitra=a belt or girdle.]

Bot.: The typical genus of Thelymitridæ (q. v.). Orchids with fascicled or tuberous roots, one solitary sheathing leaf, with loose spikes of blue, white, pink, or yellow flowers. Chiefly from Australia and New Zealand.

thē-lý-mī'-tri-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. thelymitr(a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Bot.: A family of Neottææ.

thē-lýph'-ō-nid, subst. [THELYPHONIDEA.] Any individual of the Thelyphonidea (q. v.).

thē-lŷ-phōn'-i-dæ, s. pl. [THELYPHONIDES.]
thē-lŷph-ō-nid'-ē-a, s. pl. [Mod. Latin, from thelyphonus (q. v.), and Gr. eidos=form, appearance.]

Zoöl.: An order of the Class Arachnida. Cephalothorax similar to that of the Scorpions, bearing also similar traces of its soldered segments; abdomen segmented, and united to cephalothorax by a pedicle, but never throughout its entire breadth. There are three families, all tropical.

thē-lŷ-phōn'-i-dēs, subst. pl. [Mod. Lat. thelyphon(us); Lat. masc. or fem. pl. adj. suff. -ides.]

Zoöl.: The type-family of Thelyphonidea, with one genus, Thelyphonus (q. v.). The abdomen terminates with three post-abdominal segments, to which is attached a many-jointed setiferous tail.

thē-lŷph-ō-nūs, s. [Gr. thēlyphōnos=killing women; thēlys=female, and phōnos=killing; phēnō=to kill.]

Zoöl.: The type-genus of Thelyphonides (q. v.), with twenty-nine species, confined to the tropical regions of Asia, America, and Australasia. They are nocturnal or crepuscular, living by day in damp places under the bark of old trees; when disturbed they hold up the palpi, as if for defense, and beat a rapid retreat, with the tail erect.

thēm, pron. [A. S. thām, thæm, dat. of thā=they; Icel. theim; Dan. & Sw. dem.] [THEY.] The dative and objective case of they; those persons or things; those.

¶ Thenceforth is frequently preceded by from, a pleonasm, but sanctioned by good usage.

"From thenceforth Pilate sought to release him"—John xix. 12.

thēnce'-for-ward, adv. [Eng. thence, and for-ward.] From that time or place onward.

"When he comes to the Lord's table, every communicant professes to repent, and promises to lead a new life thenceforward."—Kettlewell.

thēnce'-frōm, adv. [English thence, and from.] From that place.

thennes, thens, adv. [THENCE.]

thennes-forth, adv. [THENCEFORTH.]

thē-ō-, pref. [Gr. theos=God.] The first element in many words derived from the Greek referring to the Divine Being or divinity.

thē-ō-brō'-mā, s. [Pref. theo=god, and Greek brōma=food.]

Bot.: A genus of Byttneraceæ. Small trees, with large simple leaves, and the flowers in clusters. Sepals five; petals five, hooded, ligulate at the apex, stamens five, each with double anthers, and a horn-like appendage between the filaments; styles filiform; fruit large, five-celled; stigma five-parted; more or less pentagonal fruits, with a thick tough rind, seed embedded in pulp: albumen none; cotyledons thick, oily, wrinkled.

Theobroma Cacao, the Cacao-tree, is sixteen or eighteen feet high, with large, oblong, entire, acuminate, smooth leaves; clusters of flowers, with the calyx rose-colored and the petals yellowish. Fruit six to ten inches long, three to five broad, with ten elevated longitudinal ribs. The ripe fruits are yellow. Each contains between fifty and a hundred seeds. These, slightly fermented, constitute the cocoa. Great forests of the Cacao-tree exist in Demarara. It is also cultivated extensively in the West Indies, and grows as far north as Mexico, and has been introduced into India and Ceylon. A concrete oil, obtained by expression and heat from the ground seeds, is used as an emollient. It does not become rancid, and on that account is largely used in pharmacy for the preparation of suppositories and pessaries.

Theobroma.

Branch of Cacao-tree, flower, and fruit.

thē-ō-brō'-míc, a. [Mod. Lat. theobrom(a); -ic.] Derived from Theobroma cacao.

theobromic-acid, s.

Chem.: C₈H₁₂N₂O₂. Obtained from cacao-butter by saponification, and fractional distillation of the product. It melts at 72.2°, and distills at a higher temperature without decomposition.

thē-ō-brō'-mine, subst. [Mod. Lat. theobrom(a); -ine.]

Chemistry: C₇H₈N₄O₂. An alkaloid present in the seeds of Theobroma cacao, to the extent of from one to two per cent. It can be obtained by treating a hot-water extract of the ground beans with acetate of lead, removing excess of lead with sulphydric acid, evaporating the solution, and extracting the theobromine with alcohol. It forms short prismatic crystals, having a bitter taste, slightly soluble in water and alcohol. It is neutral, but unites with acids forming crystalline salts. Heated to 100° with methyl iodide it is converted into methyl-theobromine or theine.

thē-ō-chris'-tic, adj. [Pref. theo, and Greek christos=anointed; chrīō=to anoint.] Anointed by God.

thē-ōc'-ra-çŷ, subst. [Gr. theokratia=the rule of God; theos=god, and kratos=strength, government, power; Fr. théocratie.]

1. Government of a state by the immediate direction of God; a state of civilization and religion in which the political power is exercised by a sacerdotal caste; as in the case of the Israelites, with whom the theocracy lasted till the time of Saul.

"Thus the Almighty becoming their king, in as real a sense as he was their God, the republic of the Israelites was properly a theocracy in which the two societies, civil and religious, were of course entirely incorporated."—Warburton. Divine Legation, bk. v., § 2.

2. A state governed by the immediate direction of God.

thē-ōc'-ra-sŷ, s. [Gr. theokrasia, from theos=god, and krasis=a mixture.]

1. Ord. Lang.: A mixture of the worship of different gods.

2. Anc. Philos.: The intimate union of the soul with God in contemplation, which was considered attainable by the Neoplatonists.

thē-ō-crāt, s. [THEOCRACY.] One who lives under a theocracy; one who is ruled in civil affairs directly by God.

thē-ō-crāt'-ic, thē-ō-crāt'-ic-al, a. [Fr. théocratique.] Of or pertaining to a theocracy; administered by the immediate direction of God.

thē-ō-dī-çæ'-a, s. [THEODICY.]

thē-ō-dī-çæ'-an, a. [Eng. theodicy; -an.] Of or pertaining to theodicy (q. v.).

thē-ōd'-l-çy, s. [Gr. theos=God; dikē=justice.]

Philos.: A vindication of the Deity in respect of the organization of the world, and the freedom of the human will. The term is specially applied to a defense of Theism against Atheism, which Leibnitz undertook by publishing, in 1710, his Essai de Théodicée, respecting the goodness of God, the liberty of man, and the origin of the Bible. The problem theodicy proposes to solve is stated and estimated by Albert Taylor Bledsoe, LL.D., as follows: "How, under the government of an infinitely perfect Being, evil could have proceeded from a creature of his own, has ever been regarded as the great difficulty pertaining to the intellectual system of the universe." (Theodicy. Intro. II.) [OPTIMISM, 1.]

"Among the infinitude of possibilities, God, being good, must have chosen that which is best. And what is best? That which presents the most perfect order and harmony. The basis of all philosophy, therefore [according to Leibnitz], will be the conviction that whatever is is for the best; that everything is good, harmonious, and beautiful. Philosophy is a Theodicy."—G. H. Lewes: Hist. Philos. (ed. 1880), ii. 272.

thē-ōd'-ō-līte, subst. [Etym. doubtful; perhaps from Gr. theōmai, for theaomai=to see; hodos=a way, and litos=smooth, even, plain. It occurs in Blount, ed. 1674.] A most important instrument for measuring horizontal and vertical angles, but particularly adapted for accurately measuring the former. Its principle is identical with that of the altitude and azimuth instrument; the construction and purpose of the two, however, differ, the latter being employed for astronomical purposes, while the theodolite is used for land surveying; but the better instruments of this class may be employed for observing the altitude of celestial bodies. The vertical circle is not generally, however, of sufficient size, nor so graduated as to be available for very accurate astronomical observations. In the cut which shows the form known as a Y theodolite, from the shape of the rests in which the telescope D is free to rotate, D is an ordinary refracting telescope, having in the principal focus of its object-glass an arrangement of fibers of unspun silk, called cross-wires. One of these fibers is level when the instrument is correctly set up, and two others like the letter X, intersect at a point in the first. When a point is to be viewed with the telescope, the telescope is moved so that the image of the point coincides with the intersection of the cross wires. The vertical limb E is divided into degrees, and is capable of being read by means of the vernier and the microscope e, to thirds of a minute. A pair of plates, A and B, constituting at their edge the horizontal limb of the instrument, are free, when unclamped, to move independently of each other. The plate A carries a magnetic compass and two spirit levels, c and c', at right angles to each other, by means of which the circle may be brought accurately into the horizontal plane by raising or depressing it by means of the screws, b b b. The plate A is furnished with two verniers, a, a', diametrically opposite to each other, the degrees marked on which are read off by the microscope d. c is the vertical axis, and the whole upper portion of the instrument may rotate about c, except when c is clamped by means of the screw g; the screw h gives an azimuth motion after the screw g has been tightened. By the motion of the telescope D, on the horizontal axis of the vertical limb E, altitudes and vertical angles can be measured, while, by its motion on the vertical axis c, the angular distances between two objects can be ascertained by the readings on the horizontal circle A. Before using a theodolite, it should be properly adjusted; that is, the different parts should be brought to their proper relative positions. The theodolite is in adjustment when the following conditions are fulfilled: 1. When the intersection of the cross-wires is in the axis of the telescope; that is, in the line which remains fast when the telescope is turned in the Y's; 2. When the axis of the attached level is parallel to the axis of the telescope; 3. When the axes of the levels on the horizontal limb are perpendicular to the axis of the horizontal limb; and 4. When the axis of the vertical limb is perpendicular to the axis of the horizontal limb.

theodolite-magnetometer, s. An instrument employed as a declinometer to measure variations in declination, and as a magnetometer in determinations of force.

Theodolite.

thē-ōd'-ō-līt'-ic, a. [Eng. theodolite(e); -ic.] Of or pertaining to a theodolite; made by means of a theodolite; as, theodolitic observations.

Thē-ō-dō'-sī-an, adj. [See def.] Pertaining or relating to the Emperor Theodosius (A. D. 401-450), or to the code of laws compiled under his direction.

Thē-ō-dō'-tī-an (tī as shī), s. [See def.]

Ecclesiology and Church History (pl.):

1. A sect named after Theodotus, a tanner of Byzantium, who, apostatizing during a Roman persecution (A. D. 192), palliated his fall by representing that Jesus, notwithstanding His miraculous conception, was only a man. He [Theodotus], therefore, had denied man, and not God.

2. The followers of a disciple of the former, a banker, also called Theodotus, who organized the sect, A. D. 210. He held that Jesus, though born a man, became God at His baptism. Some of Theodotus' followers thought that Jesus did so at His resurrection and some not at all. Called also Melchisidicians (q. v.).

thē-ō-gōn'-ic, a. [Eng. theogon(y); -ic.] Of or relating to theogony.

"One appertains to an earlier theogonic scheme."—Gladstone: Juventus Mundi, ch. vii.

thē-ōg'-ō-nism, subst. [Eng. theogon(y); -ism.] The same as THEOGONY (q. v.).

thē-ōg'-ō-nist, s. [Eng. theogon(y); -ist.] One who is versed in or writes on theogony.

"Such theologers as these, who were theogonists."—Cudworth: Intell. System, p. 114.

thē-ōg'-ō-nŷ, s. [Lat. theogonia, from Gr. theogonia=the origin of the gods (the title of a poem by Hesiod), from theos=God, and gonē=generation, from same root as genos=race; gignomai=to become; Fr. théogonie; Sp. & Ital. teogonia.] Originally, the name given to the class of poems which treated of the generation and descent of the gods; hence, that branch of heathen theology which taught of the origin or generation of the gods.

"The theogonies, or poems which trace the descent of the gods."—Cox: Introd. to Mythology, p. 35.

thē-ōl'-ō-gāl, s. [THEOLOGUS.]

thē-ōl'-ō-gās-tēr, s. [English theolog(y); suff. -aster, used in contempt, as in poetaster, &c.] A kind of quack in theology or divinity; a pretender to a knowledge of theology.

"Offered unto God himself, by a company of theologasters."—Burton: Anat. Melan., p. 251.

thē-ōl'-ō-gēr, s. [Eng. theolog(y); -er.] A theologian.

"Now it is very true that some Christian theologers also have made God to be All, according to these latter senses."—Cudworth: Intell. System, p. 307.

thē-ōl'-ō-gī-an, s. [Eng. theology; -an.] One who is well versed in theology; a professor of theology or divinity; a divine.

"Some theologians have been employed to defile places erected only for religion and truth, by defending oppressions and factions."—Haywood: Life of Edward VI.

thē-ōl'-ō-gī-ic-al, thē-ōl'-ō-gī-ic, a. [Eng. theolog(y); -ical, -ic.] Of or pertaining to theology or divinity.

"I mean not to consider the theological opinions of Erasmus, but his learning and his genius."—Knox: Essays, No. 132.

theological-virtues, s. pl. A term applied to the virtues of Faith, Hope, and Charity, because they relate immediately to God, and are founded on His word, and on that alone.

thē-ōl'-ō-gī-ic-al-lŷ, adv. [Eng. theological; -ly.] In a theological manner; according to the principles of theology.

"The Archbishop of York reasoned theologically concerning his disobedience."—Camden: Hist. Queen Elizabeth (an. 1587).

thē-ōl'-ō-gī-ics, s. [THEOLOGIC.] The same as THEOLOGY (q. v.).

"Who thus excell
In theologies."

Young: Love of Fame, v.

thē-ōl'-ō-gīst, subst. [Eng. theolog(y); -ist.] A theologian.

"He [Claymond] was a person of great gravity, of most exact example in his life and conversation, very charitable and devout, and had nothing wanting in him to complete a theologist."—Wood: Athenæ Oxon., vol. i.

thē-ōl'-ō-gī-ūm, s. [THEOLOGY.] A small upper stage in the ancient theater, upon which the machinery for celestial appearances was arranged.

thē-ōl'-ō-gīze, v. t. & i. [Eng. theolog(y); -ize.]

A. Trans.: To render theological.

"It cannot be denied but that the Pagans did in some sense or other deifie or theologize all the parts of the world, and things of nature."—Cudworth: Intell. System, p. 509.

B. Intrans.: To frame a system of theology; to theorize or speculate upon theological subjects.

thē-ōl'-ō-gīz-ēr, s. [English theologiz(e); -er.] One who theologizes; a theologian.

thē-ō-lōgue, s. [THEOLOGY.] A theologian.

"Ye gentle theologues of calmer kind."

Young: Night Thoughts, vii.

thē-ōl'-ō-gūs, thē-ōl'-ō-gāl, s. [Eccles. Lat. theologus=a theologian.]

Roman Church: A canon theologian appointed in cathedral and collegiate churches to deliver lectures on theology and Holy Scripture. (Conc. Trid., sess. v., de ref., c. 1.)

thē-ōl'-ō-gŷ, the-ol-o-gie, s. [Fr. théologie, from Latin theologia; Gr. theologia=a speaking about God; theologos=speaking about God: theos=God, and logos=a word; legō=to speak.]

1. Classic: A term applied by the classic authors to treatises on the nature and worship of the gods, such as the Works and Days of Hesiod, and the de Natura Deorum of Cicero. Augustine (De Civitate) quotes Eusebius and Varro as dividing theology into three kinds: the fabulous, that of the poets; the natural, that of the philosophers; and the political, that of the priests and the common people. The first and second kinds could be changed according to the will of the investigators; but the last could not be altered without national consent.

2. Christian: The science which treats of divine things, especially of the relations of man to God. Doctrinal formulas are recognized in Scripture, which uses such expressions as "the mysteries of God" (1 Cor. iv. 1), "the form of sound words" (2 Tim. i. 13), "sound doctrine" (Titus i. 9); but the term theology does not occur, though the elements of which it is compounded are found in close connection, Gr. ta, logia, tou, Theou=the oracles of God (Rom. iii. 2; cf. also 1 Peter iv. 11). Theology is primarily divided into Natural and Supernatural, or Revealed; the former deduced by reason from a survey of the universe, the latter founded on revelation. Natural religion is recognized in Scripture (Ps. xix. 1-6, Rom. i. 19, 20), and is held to establish the being, power, wisdom, and goodness of God, the obligation of His moral law and the folly and danger of transgressing it, and the immortality of the soul. Revealed religion is considered to superadd to these doctrines those of the Trinity, the creation and fall of man, the penalty of sin, the mission, work, and atoning death of Christ, His resurrection, ascension, and second advent, with many other doctrines. Before a theology embracing the teaching of the Bible on these subjects can be constructed, the following sciences are required: Biblical Criticism, to ascertain the exact text of certain works claiming to be inspired, and, if possible, their time, place, and human authorship; Apologetics, to establish and defend their claim to inspiration; Hermeneutics, to investigate the principles of interpretation; Exegesis, to carry those principles into practice by actual interpretation. Dogmatic Theology follows; its province being to bring together and classify the doctrines scattered through the Bible; Polemic Theology defends these against adversaries; Practical Theology reduces them to practice, and Pastoral Theology investigates the most approved methods of presenting them to the people. Throughout Scripture there is a well-marked development or evolution of doctrine from the earliest period to the close of New Testament times. The New Testament Theology constitutes the chief basis of the theologies of all churches. It was followed by that of the Apostolic Fathers, and then by that of the Fathers in general. It varied according to the idiosyncrasy of the several writers. Most doctrines were stated at first in general terms, they were then expounded and discussed by theologians, and when necessity arose, decisions of council gave them a clear and precise form. In mediæval times great efforts were made to state theological doctrines in language derived from the metaphysics of the age, and show their harmony; the result was the Scholastic Theology (q. v.). The application of the Commandments of the moral law to individual conduct gave rise to Moral Theology (q. v.). The Protestant Theology, which commenced with Luther and Zwingle, was professedly founded on Scripture, interpreted by private judgment, the right of exercising which was boldly asserted; that of the Roman Catholics was founded on the consensus of the Fathers, the decisions of councils, and of the Holy See, and not on the results of individual investigation. Fearless and resolute exercise of private judgment in Germany, Holland, the Protestant cantons of Switzerland, &c., has resulted in rationalism, which has also arisen in most continental countries in union with Rome, by a reaction against authority. In the Methodist, Baptist, Reformed Episcopal, Presbyterian and English dissenting churches evangelical theology is generally accepted, though here and there more or less latent rationalism prevails. In the Anglican church there is a contest going on between the Calvinistic and Roman theology with the large influence of tractarianism in favor of the latter.

thē-ōm'-a-chist, s. [Pref. theo-, and Gr. machē = a fight.] One who fights against the gods.

thē-ōm'-a-chy, s. [THEOMACHIST.]

1. A fighting against the gods, as the battle of the giants with the gods in ancient mythology.
2. A strife or battle among the gods.
3. Opposition to the divine will.

thē-ō-măn-çy, s. [Pref. theo-, and Gr. mantheia = prophecy, divination.] A kind of divination, drawn from the responses of oracles, or from the predictions of sibyls and others supposed to be inspired immediately by some divinity.

thē-ō-mā-ni-a, s. [Gr. theomania = madness caused by a god.]

Mental Path.: A term introduced by Esquirol for a disorder in which the sufferer imagines himself to be the Deity, or that the Deity dwells in and speaks through him; used more widely to embrace religious exaltation and religious melancholy.

"An eye witness of the Irish Revivals speaks of theomania."—Bucknill & Tuke: Psychol. Med., p. 238.

Thē-ō-pās'-chite, subst. [Gr. theos = God, and paschō = to suffer.]

Church Hist. (pl.): A name given to the Monophysite followers of Peter the Fuller, Bishop of Antioch, who toward the close of the fifth century, added the clause "Who wast crucified for us" to the Trisagion (q. v.).

"He undoubtedly made this addition with sectarian views, intending to establish men more firmly in his favorite doctrine, that of but one nature in Christ. But his adversaries, especially Felix of Rome and others, perverted his meaning, and maintained that he intended to teach that all the three Persons in the Godhead were crucified, and therefore such as approved this form of the hymn were called Theopaschites."—Mosheim: Church Hist. (ed. Reid), p. 206.

thē-ō-pa-thēt'-ic, a. [Formed from theopathy, on the analogy of sympathetic, from sympathy.] Relating or pertaining to theopathy (q. v.).

thē-ō-pāth'-ic, a. [Eng. theopathy(y); -ic.] The same as THEOPATHETIC (q. v.).

"To deduce practical rules concerning the theopathic affections—faith, fear, gratitude, hope, trust, resignation, love."—Hartley: On Man, pt. ii., ch. iii., § 7.

thē-ōp'-a-thy, s. [Pref. theo-, and Gr. pathos = suffering.] Emotion excited by the contemplation of God; piety, or a sense of piety.

thē-ō-phān'-ic, a. [English theophan(y); -ic.] Pertaining or relating to theophany; making an actual appearance to man, as a god.

thē-ōph'-a-ný, s. [Pref. theo-, and Gr. phainō = to appear.]

1. The manifestation of God to man by actual appearance.

"To substitute dreams for distinct, objective, divine apparitions or Theophanies."—Contemp. Rev., July, 1887, p. 38.

2. Epiphany (q. v.).

thē-ō-phīl-ān-thrōp'-ic, a. [Eng. theophilanthrop(y); -ic.] Pertaining or relating to theophilanthropism or the theophilanthropists; uniting love to God with that to man.

thē-ō-phīl-ān-thrō-pism, s. [Eng. theophilanthrop(y); -ism.] Theophilanthropy.

thē-ō-phīl-ān-thrō-pist, s. [Eng. theophilanthrop(y); -ist.] One who unites love to God with love to man; an adherent of Theophilanthropy.

"The temple, the most worthy of the divinity, in the eyes of the Theophilanthropists, is the universe."—John Evans. Sketch of Denominations, p. 17.

thē-ō-phīl-ān-thrō-pý, s. [Greek theos = God, and philanthrōpos = a lover of men.]

Compar. Religions: The name given to a system of natural religion which arose in the time of the first French Republic, and which had for its cardinal doctrines the adoration of God and love of man. In 1796 five heads of families—Chemin, Mareau, Janes, Haüy, and Mandar—associated themselves, and in December held their first meeting at a house in the Rue St. Denis for the purposes of divine worship and moral instruction, according to the dictates of natural religion. Their services consisted of moral discourses, singing, and prayer. One of their adherents was Revellière-Lépauz, a member of the Directory, who allowed them the use of the ten parish churches of Paris, which they fitted up and adorned with religious and moral inscriptions, an ancient altar, a basket of flowers as an offering to the Supreme Being, a pulpit, and allegorical paintings and banners. In 1802 Napoleon I. forbade them to hold their meetings in the churches, and after this time they no longer appear as a body.

"This religion, which consists in worshiping God and cherishing our kind, is what we express by one single word, that of Theophilanthropy."—John Evans: Sketch of Denominations, p. 19.

thē-ō-phile, s. [Gr. theos = God, and philos = dear.] One loved by God.

thē-ō-phīl-ō-sōph'-ic, a. [Pref. theo-, and Eng. philosophic (q. v.).] Combining, or pertaining to the combination of, theism and philosophy.

thē-ōph'-ōr-ōi, s. pl. [Pl. of Greek theophoros = possessed by a god, inspired: theos = a god, and phoros = bearing.]

Church Hist.: A mystical name assumed by some of the early Christians, signifying that they were the temples of God (1 Cor. iii. 16). It is not unlikely that the term had special reference to the presence of Christ, God and Man, in those who had devoutly received the Eucharist. (Blunt.)

thē-ō-phrās'-ta, s. [Named after Theophrastus, B. C. 371(?)–285, a philosopher, author of The History of Plants, &c., and often called the Father of Botany.]

Bot.: The typical genus of Theophrastæ (q. v.). Only known species, Theophrasta jussieu. It is a small tree with an unbranched stem, and a tuft of long, evergreen leaves at the top, giving it a superficial resemblance to a palm tree. Calyx and corolla campanulate, the former cartilaginous, the latter with a short tube, having a dilated throat with an angularly-lobed, fleshy ring, and a spreading limb; stamens five. Fruit, a spherical berry, with the seeds half immersed in the placenta. T. jussieu is a native of San Domingo, and is cultivated for its fine leaves.

thē-ō-phrās'-tē-æ, s. pl. [Modern Latin theophrast(a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -æ.]

Bot.: A tribe of Myrsinaceæ (q. v.). Scales in the throat of the corolla alternate with its lobes.

thē-ōp-neūs'-tēd, adjective. [THEOPNEUSTY.] Divinely inspired; theopneustic.

thē-ōp-neūs'-ti-a, subst. [THEOPNEUSTY.] The same as THEOPNEUSTY.

"Let them beware of conjuring enchantments or cunningly devised dogmas of Theopneustia, which will not stand the test of inquiry. Discarding all these weak defenses, let them see whether the Bible is not itself Theopneustic to those who have some of the residue of the spirit by which to taste and try it."—Brit. Quarterly Review, lvii. 173. (1873.)

thē-ōp-neūs'-tīc, a. [Eng. theopneust(y); -ic.] Given by inspiration of the Spirit of God.

thē-ōp-neūs'-tý, s. [Greek theopneustos, from theos = God, and pneō = to breathe.] Divine inspiration; the supernatural influence of the Divine Spirit in qualifying men to receive and communicate revealed truth.

thē-or'-bist, s. [Eng. theorb(o); -ist.] One who plays on a theorbo.

thē-or'-bō, s. [Ital. tiorba; Fr. théorbe.]

Music: An old stringed instrument resembling the lute in form or tone. It had two necks, to the longest of which the bass strings were attached. It was employed for accompanying voices, and was in great favor during the seventeenth century. It differed from the lute in the possession of its two necks, whence it is sometimes called Cithara bijuga. The strings were usually single in the theorbo, and when double, or tuned in octaves or in unison with the base or treble notes, the instrument was called the Arch-lute, or Chittarone.

thē-ō-rēm, subst. [Lat. theoremā, from Gr. theōrēma = a spectacle, hence a subject for contemplation, a principle, a theorem, from theōrō = to look at, to behold, to view; theōros = a spectator; theōmai, theōmai = to see, to view; Fr. théorème; Sp. & Ital. teorema.]

1. Geom.: A proposition to be proved; a statement of a principle to be demonstrated; that is, the truth of which is required to be made evident by a course of reasoning, called a demonstration. In the synthetical method of investigation, which is that for the most part employed in geometry, it is usual to state the principle to be proved before commencing the demonstration, which proceeds by a regular course of argumentation to the final conclusion, confirmatory of the principle enunciated. The principle being proved, it may properly be employed as a premiss in the deduction of new truths. The principle, as enunciated before the demonstration, is the theorem; its statement after demonstration constitutes a rule or formula, according as the statement is made in ordinary or in algebraic language. A theorem differs from a problem in this, that the latter is a statement of something to be done, the former of something to be proved.

2. Alg. & Anal.: Something used to denote a rule, especially when that rule is expressed by symbols or formulæ; as, the binomial theorem.

*3. A speculative truth; a position laid down as an acknowledged truth; that which is considered and established as a principle.

"Questionless he (Soloman) was himself most conversant therein [theology]; for proof whereof he did leave so many excellent theorems and precepts of divinity to us."—Barrow: Sermons, vol. iii., ser. 22.

¶ (1) Negative theorem: A theorem which expresses the impossibility of any assertion.

(2) Particular theorem: A theorem which extends only to a particular quantity.

(3) Universal theorem: A theorem which extends to any quantity without restriction.

thē-ō-rēm, v. t. [THEOREM, s.] To reduce to or formulate into a theorem.

thē-ō-rē-māt'-ic, thē-ō-rē-māt'-ic-ā, a. [Gr. theōrēmatikos.] Pertaining to a theorem; contained in a theorem; consisting of theorems.

thē-ō-rēm'-a-tist, s. [THEOREMATIC.] One who forms theorems; one who theorizes.

thē-ō-rēm'-ic, thē-ō-rēm'-ick, a. [Eng. theorem; -ic.] Theorematic (q. v.).

"Theoremick truth, or that which lies in the conceptions we have of things, is negative or positive."—Grew.

thē-ō-rēt'-ic, thē-ō-rēt'-ic-ā, a. [Gr. theōrētikos; Fr. théorétique.] Pertaining or relating to theory; founded or depending on theory or speculation; terminating in theory or speculation; not practical; speculative.

"Admirably well turned, not only for the theoretick, but also the practical behavior of cunning fellows."—Tatler, No. 191.

And observation taught me, I would teach."
Couper: Progress of Error, 11.

thē-ō-rī-zā'-tion, s. [Eng. theoriz(e); -ation.] The act of theorizing or speculating; the formation of a theory or theories.

thē-ō-rīze, v. i. [Eng. theor(y); -ize.] To form a theory or theories; to form opinions solely by theory; to indulge in theories; to speculate.

thē-ō-rīz-ēr, subst. [Eng. theoriz(e); -er.] One who theorizes; a theorist.

thē-ō-rý, the-o-rie, s. [Fr. théorie, from Lat. theō; Gr. theōria = a beholding, contemplation, speculation; theōros = a spectator. Sp. & Ital. teoria.] [THEOREM.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Speculation; supposition explaining something; a doctrine or scheme of things which terminates in speculation or contemplation, without a view to practice; hypothesis. (Often taken in an unfavorable sense, as implying something visionary.)
2. Plan or system; scheme.
3. An exposition of the general principles of any science; as, the theory of music—that is, the speculations arising from a knowledge of the principles bōil, bōy; pōut, jōw1; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, aș; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f. -cian, -tian = șan. -tion, -sion = șhūn; -țion, -șion = zhūn. -tious, -cious, -sious = șhūs. -ble, -dle, &c. = be1, de1.

of sound. The rules for composition and arrangement of music for voices and instruments in rhythm, melody, harmony, counterpoint, and instrumentation.

4. The science distinguished from the art; the rules of an art, as distinguished from the practice; as, the theory and practice of medicine.

II. Science: An explanation of phenomena which accounts for them so satisfactorily, that there is a high probability that the true cause of their occurrence has been pointed out. It is sometimes used in science in the same sense as hypothesis; and also in the law courts, when, for instance, in a murder case it is stated that "the theory of the prosecution is," that this or this occurred. More generally scientific men use the word to signify a hypothesis which has been established as, apparently, the true one. It is thus a stronger word than hypothesis. A theory is founded on principles which have been established on independent evidence. A hypothesis merely assumes the operation of a cause which would account for the phenomena, but has not evidence that such cause was actually at work. Metaphysically, a theory is nothing more than a hypothesis supported by a large amount of probable evidence.

thē-ō-sōph, s. [THEOSOPHY.] One who claims to have a knowledge of God, or of the laws of nature, by means of internal illumination; a mystic, a theosophist.

"Within the Christian period we may number among the Theosophs the Neoplatonists."—Chambers' Encyclopedia, ix, 400.

thē-ōs-ō-phize, v. i. [Eng. theosoph(y); -ize.] To treat of or to practice theosophy.

thē-ōs-ō-phŷ, s. [Gr. theosophia=knowledge of divine things: theos=God, and sophia=wisdom; sophos=wise; Fr. théosophie; Sp. & Ital. teosofia.]

Hist.: A term signifying literally "Divine Wisdom," but which has been employed to designate several systems differing widely from each other, of which the chief are:

(1) The system of the Fire-philosophers or Rosicrucians (q. v.), who claimed to be able, by a miraculous intuition of the properties of the so-called element of fire, to provide a solution, not only for every difficulty of physics, but also for every doubtful problem in the spiritual world. The leader of this movement was Paracelsus (1493-1541); it gained many adherents on the Continent, and had a celebrated advocate in England in the person of Robert Fludd (1574-1637). These Theosophists asserted that God, who is unchangeable, acts in the kingdom of grace just as he does in the kingdom of nature; so that whoever understands how natural bodies, in particular the metals, are changed, understands also what passes in the soul in regeneration, sanctification, and renovation.

(2) A form of Christian mysticism, which, excluding the dialectic processes of philosophy and the claims of authority and revelation, professed to derive its knowledge of God from direct and immediate intuition and contemplation, or from the immediate communication of God himself. Traces of this belief are to be found in the early history of the Church, but the name Theosophy, in this connection, is applied chiefly to the system developed from the writings of Jacob Böhme, or Böhmen (1575-1624), a shoemaker of Görlitz, sometimes called the "Teutonic Philosopher." He studied the Scriptures diligently, acquired some notions of chemistry and natural science, saw visions, as he believed, and came at last to consider his speculations on the Deity and origin of things as given to him by internal illumination. According to Böhme, finite existences are an efflux from the One Infinite existence, and such efflux, manifesting itself in fire, light, and spirit, is a necessary attribute of God's own being. Angels and men owe their origin to the divine fire, from which light and love are generated in them. This triune life is the perfection of being, and the loss of it constituted the fall of angels and men. Christ restored to men the germ of paradisaical life, which is possessed by all through the new birth and His indwelling. No man can be lost except by the willful destruction of the germ of the divine life. Böhme's Theosophy, however, was at the bottom thoroughly Christian. Henry More (1614-87), to some extent, adopted Böhme's opinions, as did William Law (1686-1761), the author of A Serious Call to a Devout Life.

(3) Search after divine knowledge—the term divine applying to the divine nature of the abstract principle, not to the quality of a Personal God. (Olcott: Theosophy, p. 176.) Theosophy is apparently allied to Spiritualism, and, like it, is decidedly anti-Christian. Moreover it has been alleged, with some show of truth, that the so-called occult phenomena produced by some of the leading theosophists in support of their system are neither more nor less than conjuring tricks. (See also St. James's Gazette, June 22, 1881; Athenæum, Aug. 27, 1881; Saturday Review, Sept. 3, 1881.)

(¶) Of late years theosophy has attracted widespread attention in both hemispheres, and intimate relations have existed between the leaders of the movement; owing to facility of correspondence and travel the theosophists have been enabled to act more in unison, and the names of the leaders of the faith have become familiar to the reading public of the whole world. Some ridicule has attached to the belief on account of the extravagant expressions of some of its alleged followers, who are utterly incapable of appreciating any portion of its teachings which at all tend to metaphysics or mysticisms.

thē-ō-tēch-nic, adj. [Eng. theotechn(y); -ic.] Pertaining to the action or intervention of the gods; operated or carried on by the gods.

thē-ō-tēch-nŷ, s. [Gr. theos=God, and technē=art.] The supernatural beings introduced into any piece of literary composition.

thē-ō-thē-ca, s. [Prefix theo-, and Gr. thēkē=a case, a receptacle.] The same as MONSTRANCE (q. v.).

Thē-ōt-ō-kōs, s. [Eccles. Gr. theotokos=bringing forth or giving birth to God: theos=God, and tokos=bringing forth; tiktō=to bring forth.]

Church Hist. & Theol.: A title of the Virgin Mary. The word itself does not occur in the New Testament, but its equivalent ("the mother of my Lord") is found (Luke i. 43). As an ecclesiastical term it was adopted at the Councils of Ephesus (A. D. 431), and Chalcedon (A. D. 451), to assert the divinity of our Lord's Person.

"The title Theotokos, assigned to the Blessed Virgin by eminent Fathers before the Nestorian controversy (see Bright: Hist. Church, p. 302), and by the whole Church ever since the Council of Ephesus, is essentially a tribute to Christ's personal glory."—Liddon: Bampton Lectures (ed. 11th), p. 261. (Note d.)

"Philo on the Essenes and Therapeuts."—Saturday Review, Nov. 5, 1881, p. 585.

Thēr-a-peū-tæ, s. pl. [Gr. therapeutēs=a servant; therapeuō=to serve.]

Church Hist.: A term applied to a body of Egyptian Jews by Philo in his Contemplative Life. They arose about the end of the first century and gave themselves up entirely to contemplation of the Deity, performing none of the duties of active life, but living in solitary cells like hermits, and meeting every Saturday, which they kept as a great holiday, for devotion in common, after which they again retired to their respective semneia or cells, and spent their time in their customary speculations. Eusebius (Hist. Eccles., lib. ii., ch. xvii.) claims them as Christian monks established by St. Mark, though without using the word Therapeutæ, and says, "Who can doubt that Philo is speaking about the customs of our people?" Others have called them Contemplative Essenes [ESSENE]; Lange thought they were Oriental philosophers of melancholy temperament who had imbibed Jewish notions; and Jablonski considered them Egyptian priests addicted to astrology.

"I agree entirely with those who regard the Therapeute as being Jews claiming to be true disciples of Moses, and as being neither Christians nor Egyptians. In reality, they were wild and melancholy enthusiasts, who led a life incongruous alike with the law of Moses, and of sober reason."—Mosheim: Eccles. Hist. (ed. Reid), p. 15.

thēr-a-peū-tic, a. & s. [Fr. thérapeutique, from Lat. therapeutica (ars)=(the art) of healing, from Greek therapeutikos, from therapeutēs=a servant.] [THERAPEUTÆ.]

A. As adj.: Pertaining to the healing art; curative; concerned in discovering and applying remedies for diseases.

"Therapeutick or curative physick, we term that which restoreth the patient unto sanity, and taketh away diseases actually affecting."—Browne: Vulgar Errors, bk. iv., ch. xiii.

thēr-a-peū-tic-al, a. [Eng. therapeutic; -al.] The same as THERAPEUTIC (q. v.).

"This remedy, in my opinion, should rather be prophylactical, for prevention of the disease, than therapeutical, for the cure of it."—Ferrand: Love and Melancholy, p. 336.

thēr-a-peū-tics, s. [THERAPEUTIC.]

Med.: The science which treats of the healing of diseases. It deals with the form, manner, and time in which drugs should be administered, if needful to administer them at all; it instructs how to avoid incompatible combinations, and classifies remedial agents. (For its history in this sense, see MEDICINE, II. 3.) Therapeutics also investigates the laws of health, and how it can be preserved. [HYGIENE.] Another branch of it is Dietetics. [DIETETIC, B.]

thēr-a-peū-tist, subst. [THERAPEUTIC.] One versed in therapeutics.

thēr-a-pōn, s. [Gr. therapōn=an attendant.]

Ichthy.: A genus of Percidæ, with about twenty species, some of which are more or less marine, spread over the Indo-Pacific. Body oblong, compressed, with scales of moderate size; teeth villiform; branchiostegals six. They are all of small size, and may be readily recognized by the blackish longitudinal bands with which the body is ornamented.

thër-i-äl, thër-i-äl, a. [THERIAQ.] Theriac, medicinal.

"Yet see what account there is made of a composition called theriac, devised onely for excesse and superfluitie."—P. Holland: Pliny, bk. xxix., ch. i.

thër-i-än-thröp-ic, a. [Gr. thērion=wild beast, and anthrōpikos=of or belonging to man; human.]

Compar. Relig.: A term applied by Tiele [see extract] to one of his divisions of Polytheism; the other and higher stage he calls Anthropomorphic. [ZOOLATRY.]

"Most images of the gods are either human bodies with heads of animals or the bodies of animals with human heads. It is therefore we call their religion therianthropic."—Encyc. Brit. (ed. 9th), xx. 368.

thër-i-dī-i-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. theridi(on): Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Zoöl.: A very extensive family of Dipneumoneæ. Small or moderate-sized spiders, with the abdomen generally large, as compared with the cephalothorax, and broadly ovate. Fore legs usually the longest; eyes in two transverse rows. These spiders are found among foliage, and sometimes construct irregular webs. The species are most numerous in temperate climates, and the greater number belong to the Eastern hemisphere.

thër-rīd-i-ön, s. [Gr. thērídion=a small animal; thērion=a beast.]

Zoöl.: The typical genus of Theridiidæ (q. v.).

thër-rīd-ö-mÿs, s. [Gr. thēr=a wild beast; eidōs=form, and mÿs=a mouse.]

Palæont.: A genus of Rodents of doubtful affinities, from the Miocene of Europe.

†thër-i-ö-dönt, a. & s. [THERIODONTIA.]

A. As adj.: Of or belonging to the order Theriodontia (q. v.).

B. As subst.: Any individual of the Theriodontia (q. v.). (Q. J. G. S., 1876, p. 352.)

†thër-i-ö-dön-ti-a (ti as shī), s. pl. [Gr. thērion and odous (genit. odontos)=a tooth. Named from the mammalian character of the dentition.]

Palæont.: An order of Reptilia founded by Owen for the reception of a number of remains from deposits in South Africa of Triassic or Permian age. The dentition is of the carnivorous type, consisting of incisors, canines, and molars.

†thër-i-ö-mor-phä, s. pl. [Gr. thērion=a wild beast, and morphē=form.]

Zoöl.: Owen's name for the Tailless Amphibians (Frogs and Toads), more generally called Anoura, or Batrachia Salientia. It is a synonym of Huxley's Batrachia, a name used by Owen to designate the class Amphibia.

Skull of Theriodont.
c. Canine teeth.

böl, böy; pout, jowl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, aş; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f. -clan, -tian = şan. -tion, -sion = şün; tion, -şion = zhün. -tious, -cions, -sious = şüs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bel. dol.

thēr-i-ō-mor'-phic, a. [THERIOMORPHA.]
Compar. Relig.: Having the form of an animal.
 [ZOOLOGY.]

thēr-i-ō-sū'-chūs, s. [Gr. thērion, and souchos = an Egyptian name for the crocodile.]
Palaeont.: A genus of Crocodilia, with one species, from the Purbeck beds.

thēr-i-ōt'-ō-mỹ, s. [Gr. thērion=a wild beast, and tomē=a cutting.] The anatomy of animals; zootomy.

thērm (1), s. [THERMA.] A hot-bath, a bath.

thērm (2), s. The unit of heat. It is the amount of heat required to raise one gramme of water 1° centigrade, beginning at the temperature of water at its maximum density.

thēr'-mā, s. pl. [Lat., from Gr. thermos = hot.] Hot springs, hot baths.

thērm-ēs-thē-si-ōm'-ē-tēr, s. [Gr. therm(os) = hot, and Eng. aesthesiometer.] An instrument for measuring the sensitiveness of the body to changes of temperature.

thēr'-māl, a. [Gr. thermos=hot.] Of or pertaining to heat; warm.

thermal-alarm, s.

Mach.: An attachment for giving indications of a hot bearing.

thermal-analysis, s. The analysis of a beam of solar light, and the ascertainment, by means of a delicate thermopile, how the temperature is affected by passing over the several colors and the invisible spectrum beyond. [SPECTRUM.]

thermal-capacity, s.

Physics: The amount of heat required to raise the temperature of a body one degree.

thermal-motor, s. A machine in which the expansion and contraction of an object or material, by changes in the temperature, is made a means of motion. The term is usually applied to a machine operated by natural thermometric changes.

thermal-springs, thermal-waters, s. pl. Hot springs.

thermal-unit, s. That quantity of heat which corresponds to an interval of 1° F. in the temperature of 1 lb. advoirdupois of water at 39.10° F. It is to the French thermal unit (1° C. in 1 kilogramme of water) as 1: 3.96832.

thēr-māl-ly, adv. [Eng. thermal; -ly.] In a thermal manner; with reference to heat.

thērm-ām'-mē-tēr, s. [Eng. therm, and ammeter.] An instrument for measuring (in amperes) the strength of an electric current by the amount of heat generated.

thēr-mān'-tī-dōte, s. [Pref. therm-, and Eng. antidote (q. v.).] An East Indian apparatus for producing a current of air.

thēr-mēt'-ō-graph, thēr-mēt'-rō-graph, subst. [THERMOMETROGRAPH.]

thērm-ic, a. [Gr. thermos=hot.] Pertaining or relating to heat; thermal.

Thēr'-mī-dor, subst. [Fr.] Literally, the Hot Month, the name given in October 1793, by the French Convention to the eleventh month of the Republican year. It commenced on July 19, and was the second summer month.

Thēr-mī-dōr'-i-ān, s. [THERMIDOR.]

French Hist.: One of those who, in 1794, took part in the coup d'état by which the fall of Robespierre was effected. They were so called because the Reign of Terror was brought to an end on the 9th Thermidor.

thēr-mo-, thērm-, pref. [Gr. thermos=hot.] A prefix used in a number of compound words referring to heat or temperature.

thermo-barometer, s. An instrument for measuring altitudes by means of determining the boiling point of water. They consist essentially of a small metallic vessel for boiling water, fitted with very delicate thermometers, which are only graduated from 80° to 100°; so that each degree occupying a considerable space on the scale, the tenths, and even the hundredths of a degree, may be estimated, and thus it is possible to determine the height of a place by means of the boiling point to within about ten feet.

thermo-call, s. An electric alarm or call-bell operated by thermo-electricity. It is generally used as a fire-alarm.

Chem.: That branch of the science which deals with the heat liberated or absorbed during a chemical reaction; thus, 2 grammes of hydrogen, in combining with 16 grammes of oxygen to form water, liberates a certain definite amount of heat, viz., 69,000 calories (units of heat); while water, on being decomposed into its elements, is found to absorb the same amount of heat.

thermo-current, s.

Elect.: An electric current produced by the action of heat.

thermo-dynamic, a. Pertaining or relating to the relations between heat and mechanical work.

"Hence by thermo-dynamic principles, the heat converted into mechanical effect in the cycle of operations is . . ."—Everett: The C. G. S. System of Units, ch. ix., p. 54.

Thermo-dynamic valve: A valve depending for its operation upon the expansion and contraction occasioned by changes of temperature.

thermo-dynamics, s. pl.

Physics: The science which treats of the relations subsisting between heat and work.

thermo-electric, a. Pertaining or relating to electric currents or effects produced by heat.

Thermo-electric alarm: An apparatus designed to indicate the rise of temperature in bearings for shaftings, or in any kind of machinery or any branch of manufacture where a fixed temperature is desirable.

Thermo-electric battery:

Elect.: A battery in which an electric current is established by applying heat or cold.

Thermo-electric current:

Elect.: A current produced by heating some part of a suitable apparatus. So named by Professor Seebeck to distinguish it from the Hydro-electric, or ordinary voltaic current.

Thermo-electric force: The electromotive force of a thermo-electric circuit. (Everett: The C. G. S. System of Units, ch. xi., p. 74.)

Thermo-electric pile:

Elect.: A number of metallic plates of two different metals coupled in series, so that the whole of one set of the alternate junctions are at one side and the other set on the other. Antimony and bismuth are preferred as being farthest apart of the metals ranged in thermo-electric order. By heating one set of the junctions, electricity is developed. In practice, the face of the pile, which contains one set of junctions, is turned toward the source of heat, such as a polarized beam from an electric lantern; then, a galvanometer being placed in the circuit of the pile and equilibrated, any increase or diminution of the temperature in the beam is at once shown by movement of the galvanometer needle.

Thermo-electric series:

Electric.: Metals arranged in the order of their capacity to generate a thermo-electric current when heated.

Thermo-electric value:

Electric.: The value or capability of particular metals for thermo-electric purposes. (See extract.)

"The difference of the thermo-electric values of two metals at a given temperature, t, is the electromotive force per degree of difference between the temperatures of the junction in a couple formed of these metals, when the mean of the temperatures of the junctions is t."—Everett: The C. G. S. System of Units, ch. xi., p. 75.

Elect.: Electricity excited by application of heat to any suitable apparatus, usually the junction between two different metals. The discovery that it may be thus produced was made by Professor Seebeck, of Berlin, in 1821.

thermo-electrometer, subst. An instrument for ascertaining the heating power of an electric current, or for determining the strength of a current by the heat it produces.

thermo-element, s.

Electric.: An element which aids in producing thermo-electricity.

thermo-magnetism, s.

Elect.: Magnetism produced by the action of heat.

thermo-siphon, s. A siphon attached to hot-water heating apparatus, invented by Kewley, of London, and Fowler, of Devonshire.

thēr-mō-cāl'-cīte, s. [Pref. thermo-, and Eng. calcite.]

Petrol.: A name given by Cordier to non-crystalline limestones, most of which inclose fossil remains and various sedimentary substances.

thēr-mōch'-rō-sỹ, thēr-mō-crōse, s. [Pref. thermo-, and Gr. chrōsis=coloring.]

Physics: (See extract.)

"Definite luminous rays being distinguished by their colors, to these different obscure calorific rays Melloni gives the name of thermocrosc or heat coloration. The invisible portion of the spectrum is accordingly mapped out into a series of spaces, each possessing its own peculiar feature corresponding to the colored spaces which are seen in that portion of the spectrum visible to our eyes."—Ganot: Physics (ed. Atkinson), § 429.

thēr'-mō-gēn, subst. [Pref. thermo-, and Gr. gennaō=to produce.] An old name for caloric. (q. v.).

thēr-mōg'-ēn-ōūs, a. [THERMOGEN.] Producing heat; calorific.

thēr'-mō-graph, subst. [Pref. thermo-, and Gr. graphō=to write.] An instrument for automatically recording variations of temperature.

"Bowkett's new thermograph . . . is an instrument for recording changes of temperature, which are measured by the action of heat upon a hollow, circular metallizing ring connected with a circular vessel, the whole being filled with fluid and hermetically sealed."—Nature, vol. xxiv., p. 470. (1881.)

thēr-mōg'-ra-phỹ, s. [THERMOGRAPH.] A process by which engravings are copied on metal plates, &c., by the agency of heat.

thēr-mōl'-ō-gỹ, s. [Greek thermos=hot; suff. -ology.] A discourse on or an account of heat.

thēr-mōm'-ē-tēr, s. [Prefix thermo-, and Greek metron=a measure.]

Physics: An instrument for measuring intensity of heat, or temperature, by means of expansion of a liquid or gas. Mercury is generally employed, and an ordinary thermometer consists of a spherical or cylindrical glass bulb at the end of a very fine tube, the bulb being completely filled, and the tube partly filled, with mercury, while the space above the mercury contains only a small quantity of mercury vapor, which offers no resistance to the expansion of the mercury. A rise of temperature is indicated by a rise of the mercury in the tube, owing to expansion; and, conversely, a fall of temperature is indicated by a fall of the mercury in the tube. A graduated scale is attached, with two fixed points: the lower, or freezing point, and the upper, or boiling point, of water. The distance between the two fixed points is then divided into a certain number of equal parts, or degrees, which are continued above and below the two fixed points. On the Centigrade or Celsius thermometer (used by scientific men all over the world, and in general use on the continent of Europe), the distance between the two points is divided into 100 degrees, the freezing point being 0°, and the boiling point 100°; on the Réaumur thermometer (used only in northwestern Europe), the distance is divided into 80 degrees, the freezing point being 0°, and the boiling point 80°; on the Fahrenheit thermometer (in general use in this country and England), the distance is divided into 180 degrees, but, since zero is 32 degrees below the freezing point, the freezing point is 32°, and the boiling point is 212°. Degrees above 0° are termed + degrees, while those below 0° are termed - degrees.

$$\begin{array}{lcl} C. + 5 \times 9 + 32 = F. & & F. - 32 + 9 \times 4 = R. \\ R. + 4 \times 9 + 32 = F. & & C. + 5 \times 4 = R. \\ F. - 32 + 9 \times 5 = C. & & R. + 4 \times 5 = C. \end{array}$$

Mercury can only be used for temperatures between -40° and +675°, since it freezes at 40° and boils at 675°. For lower temperatures alcohol is used; and for high temperatures air thermometers are employed, in which changes of temperature are measured by the expansion or contraction of a known volume of air. In deep sea thermometers, used for ascertaining the temperature of the sea, the bulb is specially protected against the pressure of the water. [MAXIMUM-THERMOMETER, MINIMUM-THERMOMETER.]

thēr-mō-mēt'-ric, thēr-mō-mēt'-ric-āl, adj. [Eng. thermometer; -ic, -ical.]

1. Of or pertaining to a thermometer, or the measurement of heat.

2. Made, performed, or ascertained by a thermometer.

"[The book] comes accompanied with some preliminaries and an appendix, whereof the former contains new thermometrical experiments and thoughts."—Boyle: Works, ii. 466.

thermometric-alarm, s. An instrument to release an alarm when a dangerous heat is reached in an apartment; a form of fire-alarm. One form consists of a bent glass tube with a bulb at each end, one of which with a part of the stem contains ether; the other with a part of the stem containing mercury and open to the external air. The tube is poised on its center by gravity. Should the temperature be raised by the presence of fire, the ether would be expanded, the mercury driven into the bulb, the instrument tipped over on its axis, and the alarm sounded.

Chem.: Applied to certain approximate methods of analysis, depending on the observation of the temperature when a phenomenon takes place, or of the changes of temperature accompanying chemical reactions—e. g., fixed oils evolve different degrees of heat when treated with strong sulphuric acid, and the temperatures thus produced are used to determine the proportions of two in a mixture, or to identify two oils, especially when one is a non-drying and the other a drying oil. When 15 grms. were treated with 7.5 grms. sulphuric acid of 90 per cent., the following rise of temperature was observed in the three oils tested: olive-oil from 12-40°, rape-oil from 17-54°, and linseed oil from 16-91°.

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāl, fāther; wē, wēt, hēre, camēl, hēr, thēre; pīne, pīt, sīre, sīr, marīne; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rūle, fūll; trỹ, Sýrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw thermometric steam-gauge, s. A steam-gauge which indicates the pressure in a boiler by the amount of expansion of a fluid at the temperature due to the pressure.

thermometric-ventilator, s. A chimney valve consisting of a circular disk accurately balanced on a spindle. On one side of the disk is an inverted siphon, open at one end and having a bulb at the other. The lower part of the siphon tube contains mercury, and the bulb is full of air. Any increase of temperature expands the air in the bulb, depresses the mercury under the bulb, and, causing it to rise in the other arm of the tube, opens the valve, thus allowing the air to pass.

thēr-mō-mēt'-ric-āl-lŷ, adv. [Eng. thermometric; -ly.] In a thermometrical manner; by means of a thermometer.

thēr-mō-mēt'-rō-graph, s. [Pref. thermo-; Gr. metron=a measure, and graphō=to write.] [THERMOMETER.]

thēr-mō-mūl'-tī-pli-ēr, s. [Pref. thermo-, and English multiplier.] An instrument invented by Nobili for measuring small variations of temperature due to radiant heat. [Thermo-electric pile.]

thēr-mō-nā'-trite, subst. [Pref. thermo-; Eng. natr(on), and suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: An orthorhombic mineral, usually occurring as an efflorescence. Hardness, 1-1.5; specific gravity, 1.5-1.6; luster, vitreous. Composition: Carbonic acid, 35.5; soda, 50.0; water, 14.5=100, which is equivalent to the formula $\text{NaOCO}_2 + \text{HO}$. Found in lakes and about some mines and volcanoes.

thēr-mō-nī'-trite, s. [THERMONATRITE.]

thēr-mō-pē-gōl'-ō-gŷ, s. [Pref. thermo-; Gr. pēgē=a spring, a well, and logos=a discourse.]

Phys. Science: The science of the phenomena of hot springs, geysers, &c.

thēr'-mō-phōne, subst. [Pref. thermo-, and Gr. phōnē=sound.]

Physics: An instrument in which sonorous vibrations are produced by the expansion of heated bodies connected with an electro-magnet. It was first described by Theodor Wiesendanger in 1878.

thēr-mō-phŷll'-ite, s. [Pref. thermo-, and Eng. phyllite.]

Min.: A mineral occurring in aggregated masses of small micaceous scales, which exfoliate before the blowpipe. Hardness, 2.5; luster on cleavage faces, pearly; color, yellowish to light-brown. It is a hydrated silicate of magnesia, which Dana includes in his group of serpentines. It has been regarded as a crystallized form of the mineral serpentine. Found at Hopansuo, Finland.

thēr'-mō-pile, s. [Pref. thermo-, and Eng. pile.]

Elect.: A thermo-electric pile (q. v.).

thēr'-mō-scōpe, s. [Pref. thermo-, and Gr. skopeō=to see, to observe.] An instrument for indicating relative differences of temperature. The term was applied by Count Rumford to an instrument invented by him, and similar in principle to the differential thermometer of Prof. Leslie. [DIFFERENTIAL.]

"A thermoscope being carried from the bottom to the top of the hill, the included air, instead of shrinking in that colder region, manifestly dilated itself, and notably depressed the water."—Boyle: Works, i. 203.

thēr-mō-scōp'-ic, thēr-mō-scōp'-ic-āl, adj. [Eng. thermoscope(e); -ic, -ical.] Of or pertaining to the thermoscope; made by means of a thermoscope.

thēr'-mō-stāt, s. [Pref. thermo-, and Gr. statos=standing.] A self-acting apparatus for regulating temperatures. The name thermostat was first applied by Dr. Ure to an instrument patented by him in 1831, in which the bending of a spring composed of two unequally expansible metals, as steel and brass, was made to control a valve or damper.

thēr-mō-stāt'-ic, a. [Eng. thermostat; -ic.] Of or pertaining to the thermostat.

thermostatic-alarm, s. A device to give a signal when a certain temperature is attained; used as a fire-alarm or as a warning of the heating of a journal, &c.

thēr-mōt'-ic, thēr-mōt'-ic-āl, a. [Gr. thermos=hot.] Of or relating to heat; resulting from or depending on heat.

thēr-mōt'-ics, s. [THERMOTIC.] The science of heat.

thēr'-mō-tŷpe, s. [Pref. thermo-, and Eng. type (q. v.).] An impression (as of a slice of wood) taken by means of wetting with dilute acid, pressing on the object, and subsequently heating the impression.

thēr'-mō-tŷp-ŷ, s. [THERMOTYPE.] The act or process of producing a thermotype.

ther-of, adv. [THEREOF.]

thēr'-ōid, a. [Gr. thēr=an animal, and eidōs=form, appearance.] Animal; having animal properties or characteristics. Specifically applied to idiots, who in habits or appearance resemble any of the lower animals. The word is of recent introduction, but the extraordinary resemblances presented by some of the weak-minded to certain birds and mammals have attracted attention for a very long period. Pinel (quoted by Bucknill & Tuke: Psychol. Med., p. 152) speaks of "a young female idiot . . . who, in the form of her head, her tastes, her mode of living, seemed to approach to the instincts of a sheep."

thēr-ōl'-ō-gŷt, s. [Eng. therolog(y); -ist.] One versed in therology; a student of therology or mammalogy.

"A gentleman who, to use a newly-coined transatlantic word, is certainly one of the first therologists of his country."—Academy, Aug. 25, 1877.

thēr-ōl'-ō-gŷy, s. [Gr. thēr (genit. thēros)=a wild beast; suff. -ology.] That branch of zoology that treats of the mammalia; mammalogy.

ther-on, adv. [THEREON.]

thēr-ōp'-ō-dā, s. pl. [Gr. thēr (genit. thēros)=a beast of prey, and pous (genit. podos)=a foot.]

Palæont.: An order of Cope's sub-class Dinosauria, consisting of carnivorous forms, which are believed to have preyed on the weaker herbivorous members of the class. Feet digitigrade, digits with prehensile claws; vertebrae more or less cavernous; fore limbs very small, limb bones hollow. The order comprises four families (Megalosauridæ, Zanclo-dontidæ, Amphisaauridæ, and Labrosauridæ) and two groups or sub-orders (Cœluria and Compsognathæ).

thēr-sīt'-ic-āl, adj. [After Thersites, a foul-mouthed character in Homer's Iliad.] Grossly abusive.

"A pelting kind of therstical satire."—Sterne: Tristram Shandy, vi. 140.

ther-to, adv. [THERETO.]

ther-with, adv. [THERewith.]

ther-with-all, adv. [THERewithal.]

thē-rŷth'-rŷn, subst. [Pref. th(io)-, and Eng. erythrin.]

Chem.: One of the products obtained, according to Zeise, by the simultaneous action of ammonia and sulphur upon acetone.

thē-sāu'-rŷs, thē-sāu-rār'-ŷ-ŷm, s. [Lat. thesaurus; Gr. thēsauros.] A treasury; a lexicon.

thesaurus verborum, s. A treasury of words; a lexicon. Often simply thesaurus.

thēse, thas, thes, theos, thos, thuse, pron. or a. [A. S. dhās, dhās, pl. of dhes=this (q. v.).] The plural of this (q. v.). These and those are used in contradistinction in the same way as this and that: these referring to the persons or objects which are nearest in order or place, or were last mentioned; those to the persons or objects furthest in order, &c.

"Bids these in elegance of form excel."

Cowper: Retirement, 793-4.

thē-sī-cle, s. [A dimin. from thesis (q. v.).] A little or subordinate thesis; a proposition.

thē-sis, s. [Lat., from Gr. thesis=a proposition, a statement, something laid down: from the root of tithēmi=to place; Fr. thèse; Sp. tesis; Ital. tesi.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. A position or proposition which a person puts forward or advances, or offers to maintain; a subject proposed for a school or college exercise; a theme, an exercise.

"An honest but a simple pair

May serve to make this thesis clear."

Prior: Paulo Purganti.

*2. A theory.

"To lay down a practice of physic, conformable to his thesis of the circulation of blood."—Fuller: Worthies; Kent.

3. An essay or dissertation upon a specific subject or theme, as an essay presented by a candidate for a diploma or degree.

II. Technically:

1. Logic: An affirmation, in distinction from a supposition or hypothesis.

2. Music: The downward wave of the hand to denote the absence of accent. [ARSIS.]

3. Pros.: The depression of the voice in pronouncing the syllables of a word; the part of a foot on which the depression of the voice falls. [ARSIS.]

4. Rhet.: The part of a sentence preceding and corresponding to the antithesis (q. v.).

thē-ŷi-ŷm, subst. [Latin thesion, thesium=the bastard toad-flax.]

Bot.: Bastard Toad-flax; a genus of Santalaceæ. Flowers small, green; perianth four or five-cleft, persistent; stamens with a small fascicle of hair at their base; stigma simple; ovary inferior; ovules three; drupe ribbed, crowned with the persistent perianth. Known species about sixty, all from the eastern hemisphere. Thesium linophyllum is a perennial parasite on roots, with diffuse stems, one-nerved leaves, minute flowers, green outside, white inside, with green ovoid fruit.

thēs-mō-phōr'-ŷ-a, s. [Gr. thesmophoros=law-giving; an epithet applied to Demeter: thesmos=law, and phoros=bearing.]

Greek Antiq.: A festival in honor of Ceres, or Demeter, because she first taught mankind the use of laws. It was celebrated by many cities of Greece, but with most observation, and ceremony by the Athenians. The worshipers were free-born women (whose husbands defrayed the expenses of the solemnity), assisted by a priest and a band of virgins. The women were clothed in white garments, as emblematic of purity.

thēs'-mō-thēte, s. [Gr. thesmothetēs, from thesmos=law, and thetēs=one who places, from tithēmi=to place; Fr. thesmothète.]

Gr. Antiq.: A lawgiver; a legislator; one of the six inferior archons at Athens who presided at the election of the lower magistrates, received criminal informations in various matters, decided civil causes on arbitration, took the votes at elections, and performed a variety of other offices.

thēs-pē-ŷi-a, s. [Gr. thespesios=divine, sacred, from the fact that Thespesia populnea is planted around monasteries and convents, in tropical countries, for the sake of the shade which it affords, and so has come to be regarded with a kind of veneration.]

Botany: A tribe of Hibisceæ. Trees with large entire leaves; involucre three-leaved, deciduous; calyx truncate; style simple; stigmas five; fruit almost woody; capsule with five cells, each with about four seeds. Thespesia populnea is a tree forty or fifty feet high, with the foliage so dense at the top that it has been called the Umbrella-tree. It has roundish, cordate, pointed, five to seven-veined leaves; the flowers, which are large, are yellow, with a dark-red center. The tree is very common along the sea-coast of South America, the West Indies, the Pacific Islands, part of Africa, India, and Burmah. It has been planted along roadsides throughout India, and especially in Madras city. It yields a gum, a deep-red, somewhat thick oil, used in cutaneous affections. The capsule and flowers furnish a yellow dye, and the bark a good fiber. T. lampas is a small bush, common in the tropical jungles of India, with a good fiber, as has T. populnea.

Thēs'-pŷ-an, a. & s. [See def.]

A. As adj.: Of or pertaining to Thespiis, a Greek dramatic poet, born at Icaria, an Athenian town, at the beginning of the sixth century B. C.; hence, relating to the drama or theatrical representation.

B. As subst.: An actor.

"The Lord Chamberlain . . . clapped the unoffending Thespian in the Gate House."—Doran: Their Majesties' Servants (ed. 1864), i. 121.

Thespian-art, s. The drama.

Thēs-sā'-lŷ-an, a. & s. [See def.]

A. As adj.: Of or pertaining to Thessaly; hence, magic, Thessaly in classic times being considered the home of the witches. (Hor.: Carm., i. 27, 21; Plin.: H. N., xxx. 1.)

¶ St. Paul's Epistles to the Thessalonians:

New Testament Canon

1. The First Epistle of Paul the Apostle to the Thessalonians. St. Paul, on his second missionary journey, about A. D. 52, leaving Philippi [PHILIPPIAN, ¶], after his unjust imprisonment there (Acts xvi. 9-40), passed through Amphipolis and Apollonia, and went on to Thessalonica, where, for three successive Sabbaths in the Jewish synagogue, he contended that the Christ, Messiah, or Anointed One, of Old Testament prophecy, was destined to suffer and to rise again, and that Jesus was that Christ. His missionary efforts were probably continued for a considerable time longer outside the synagogue. A multitude of devout Greeks, not a few of the chief women, and others believed. This success, however, infuriated the unbelieving Jews, who broke into riot, drew to them the rougher part of the lower classes, assaulted the house of Jason, and dragged him and other believers before the magistrate, who released them, after taking security for their future conduct. The Christians secretly conveyed Paul from the place by night, the apostle going to Berea, whither the Thessalonian Jews followed him, compelling him again to leave, his new destination being Athens, and thence to "The first, a travelling tailor, who by the mystery of his needle and thimble had survey'd the fashions of the French and English."—Beaum. & Flét.: Fair Maid of the Inn.

2. Bot.: (1) Digitalis purpurea; (2) Silene maritima.

3. Build.: A sleeve around a stove-pipe when it passes through a wall or ceiling.

4. Machinery:

(1) A sleeve or tube through which a bolt passes, and which may act as a stay.

(2) A ferrule to expand a tube; specifically, a ferrule for boiler-tubes.

5. Naut.: An iron ring having an exterior groove worked into a rope or sail, for the purpose of receiving another rope or a lanyard; a large eyelet.

thimble-berry, s.

Bot.: (1) A kind of black raspberry, Rubus occidentalis, common in America; (2) R. spectabilis; (3) R. nutkanus.

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camēl, hēr, thēre; pīne, pīt, sīre, sīr, marīne; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rāle, fūll; trŷ, Sŷrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

thimble-case, s. A case for holding a thimble or thimbles.

thimble coupling, s.

Mach.: A kind of permanent coupling, of which the coupling-box consists of a plain ring of metal, supposed to resemble a tailor's thimble, bored to fit the two connected ends of the shafts. The connection is secured by pins passed through the ends of the shafts and thimble, or by a parallel key or feather bedded in the boss ends of the shafts, and let into a corresponding groove in the thimble. Called also pump-coupling or ring-coupling.

thimble-eye, s.

Naut.: An eye in a plate through which a rope is rove without a sheave.

thimble-joint, s. A sleeve-joint, with an interior packing to keep the joints of pipes tight during expansion and contraction.

thimble-rig, s. A sleight-of-hand trick, performed by means of three thimbles and a pea. The pea being placed on a table and covered with one of the thimbles, the performer proceeds to shift the thimbles, covering the pea now with one, now with another, and offers to bet any bystander that no one can tell under which thimble the pea is. The person betting is seldom allowed to win, the pea being abstracted by sleight of hand.

thimble-rig, v. t. or i. To cheat by means of thimble-rigging.

thimble-rigger, s. One who practices the trick of thimble-rig; a trickster.

"Thimble-riggers abounded, and their tables were surrounded by 'bonnets.'"—London Daily Telegraph.

thimble-rigging, a. & s.

A. As adj.: Practicing the tricks of a thimble-rigger.

B. As subst.: The acts or tricks of a thimble-rigger.

thimble-skein, s.

Vehicles: A sleeve over the arm of a wagon-axle; distinguished from a strap-skein, which is simply a flat iron strip let into the wood of the axle-arm to take the wear from the wood.

thimble-weed, s.

Bot.: The genus Rudbeckia; so named from the shape of the receptacle.

thimble-ful, s. [Eng. thimble, and ful(l).] As much as may be contained in a thimble; hence, any very small quantity.

"Had the credit of suggesting the addition of a thimbleful of Veuve Clicquot."—London Daily Telegraph.

thime (th as t), s. [THYME.]

thin, thinne, thunne, thynne, a. & adv. [A. S. thynne; cogn. with Dut. dun; Icel. thunnr; Dan. tynd; Sw. tunn; O. H. Ger. dunni; Ger. dünn; Welsh teneu; Gael. & Irish tana; Lat. tenuis; Gr. tanaos; Sansc. tana. From the root tan=to stretch, seen in Lat. tendo=to stretch; A. S. áthenian; Gr. teinō; Eng. tenuity, attenuate, &c.]

A. As adjective:

1. Literally:

1. Having little thickness or extent from one surface to its opposite; slim; as, thin paper, a thin board, &c.

2. Rare; not dense. (Used of the air and æriform fluids.)

"Melted into air, thin air."

Shakesp.: Tempest, iv. 1.

3. Not sufficient for a covering; easily seen through; flimsy.

"This distinction is a metaphysical nothing, and is brought only to amuse men that have not leisure to consider. And he that says one, says the other; or as bad, under a thin and transparent cover."—Ep. Taylor: Dissuasive from Popery, bk. i., pt. ii., § 5.

4. Deficient in such ingredient as gives body or substance; not insipidated; not containing much solid matter in solution or suspension; deficient in body.

"To warm new milk, pour any alkali; the liquor will remain at rest, though it appear somewhat thinner."—Arbuthnot.

5. Not close; not crowded together so as to fill the space; not having the individuals of which the thing is composed close, compact, or dense.

"Early sowing and thin seeding are among the best means for securing that desirable end."—London Daily Telegraph.

6. Not crowded or well filled; not full.

"Ferrara is very large, but extremely thin of people."—Addison: On Italy.

7. Slim, slender; not fat or stout.

"My face so thin."—Shakesp.: King John, i.

8. Not full or full-grown.

"Seven thin ears blasted with the east wind."—Genests xli. 6.

*9. Scanty, small, poor.

"A thin and slender pittance."

Shakesp.: Taming of the Shrew, iv. 4.

10. Faint, feeble, slight, meager; destitute of volume or fullness. (Said of sound.)

II. Fig.: Flimsy, unsatisfactory; as, The excuse was rather thin. Used also of literary work of a poor quality.

B. As adv.: Not thickly or closely; thinly, scatteredly, scantily. (See the compounds.)

¶ Thin is largely used in compounds, the meanings being in most cases sufficiently obvious; as, thin-faced, thin-peopled, &c.

thin-clad, a. Slightly or scantily clad.

thin-gut, s. A starveling.

thin-set, a. Planted thinly; not thick-set.

"Thin-set with palm,

And olive rarely interspers'd."

J. Philips: Cerealia.

thin-sheeted, a. Wearing or covered with thin sheets.

"All hail, M. P. I from whose infernal brain Thin-sheeted phantoms glide, a grisly train."

Byron: English Bards and Scotch Reviewers.

thin-skinned, a. Having a thin skin; hence, fig., unduly sensitive, easily offended or irritated.

thin-spun, a. Spun to thinness or fineness; fine" spun, thin, delicate.

"Comes the blind Fury with the abhorred shears,

And slits the thin-spun life."—Milton: Lycidas, 76.

thin, v. t. & i. [THIN, a.]

A. Transitive:

1. To make thin or less thick; to attenuate; to make slender or lean.

"The serum of the blood is neither acid nor alkaline; oil of vitriol thickens, and oil of tartar thins it a little."—Arbuthnot.

2. To make less crowded, close, or numerous; to diminish the number of; to reduce in numbers. (Often used with out; as, to thin out a forest.)

"If those sects were to be thinned by a large desertion."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xi.

3. To attenuate; to rarefy; to make less dense; as, to thin the air.

B. Intrans.: To diminish in thickness; to become thin or thinner; to waste away.

¶ Often with away or out; as, geological strata are said to thin out when they gradually diminish in thickness till they disappear.

"Their cheeks with thin or droop."

My Beautiful Lady.

thine, thin, adj. or pron. [A. S. dhin, poss. pron. declined like an adjective; derived from dhin, genit. case of dhū=thou (q. v.). Cogn. with Icel. thinn, thin, thitt, from thin, genit. of thú; Dan. & Sw. din; Ger. dein, from deiner, genit. of du; Goth. theins, from theina, genit. of thu. In Mid. Eng. thin was declined, genit. thines, dat. thine, nom. and accus. pl. thine; by loss of n came Mid. Eng. thi=Eng. thy. The n was commonly retained before a vowel and when the pronoun followed the substantive.] Thy; belonging to thee; being the property of thee; relating to thee. Like thou, thine is now seldom used except in poetry, solemn discourses, or the language of the Quakers. Thine is the form generally used before a vowel, thy taking its place before consonants; but this use is not strictly adhered to, many writers using both forms before vowels, but thine is always used if it follows the noun. Like hers, ours, yours, mine, his, theirs, thine is used absolutely or independently—that is, without the noun to which it belongs—and serves either as a nominative or objective or predicate; as, Thine are poor, Give me thine, That house is thine.

"Give every man thine ear, but few thy voice."

Shakesp.: Hamlet, i. 3.

thing, thyng, s. [A. S. thing=a cause, sake, office, reason, council; cogn. with Dut. ding; Icel. thing=a thing . . . a meeting; Dan. & Sw. ting; O. H. Ger. dinc; Ger. ding. From the same root as A. S. théon=to thrive [THEE, v.]; thingan=to grow.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Anything which can be made the subject of consideration or discussion; anything separable or distinguishable as an object of thought; anything animate or inanimate; whatever exists, or is conceived to exist, as a separate entity.

"The universality of one name to many things, hath been the cause that men think the things are themselves universal; and so seriously contend, that besides Peter and John, and all the rest of the men that are, have been, or shall be in the world, there is yet something else that we call man, viz., man in general—deceiving themselves, by taking the universal, or general appellation, for the thing it signifieth."—Hobbs: Human Nature, ch. v.

2. An inanimate object as distinguished from a living being; any lifeless material or object.

"Ye meads and groves, unconscious things!

Ye know not whence my pleasure springs."

Couper: Secrets of Divine Love.

3. Applied to man or animals, often in pity or contempt, sometimes with an idea of fondness, tenderness, or admiration.

"The insult of being compared with such a thing as Barère."—Macaulay: Barère.

4. An act, a deed, a transaction, a matter, an event, an action; anything which happens or falls out, or is done, told, or proposed.

"He by whose authority these things had been done, had abdicated the government."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. x.

*5. A piece of composition; as, a tale, a poem, a piece of music, or the like.

"I have a thing in prose, begun about twenty-eight years ago, and almost finished; it will make a four shilling volume."—Swift.

6. A portion, a part, an item, a particular. In this sense generally compounded with any or no, and often used adverbially.

7. (Pl.): Clothes, accouterments, furniture, baggage; what one carries about with him; as, Pack up my things.

8. A judicial or legislative assembly among Scandinavian people, as in Iceland or Norway. The thingvalla in Iceland was a spot in the southern part of the island, where the althing, or general parliament, was accustomed to meet in the middle ages. (Pron. ting.)

II. Law: A subject of dominion or property, as distinguished from a person.

"Things real are such as are permanent, fix'd, and immoveable, which cannot be carried out of their place; as lands and tenements; things personal are goods, money, and all other moveables; which may attend the owner's person wherever he thinks proper to go."—Blackstone: Commentaries, bk. ii., ch. 2.

¶ (1) A thing of nothing, a thing of naught: A phrase used to denote anything very worthless.

"You must say, paragon: A paramour is, God bless us! a thing of naught."—Shakesp.: Midsummer Night's Dream, iv. 2.

(2) The thing: As it ought to be; in the normal, perfect, or becoming condition; applied colloquially to an ideal or typical condition, as of health, dress, conduct, completeness, perfectness, exactness, becomingness, or the like.

thing'-üm-bōb, s. [A ludicrous formation from thing.] A term used when one is at a loss for a definite name for some object; a what's-its-name, a what-do-you-call-it.

"You will then see in the middle of a broad plain a lonely grey house, with a thingumbob at the top; a 'servatory' they call it."—Lytton: Eugene Aram, bk. i., ch. ii.

think, thenke, thynke, thinke (past tense thought, thoughte*, pa. par. thought), v. i. & t. [A. S. thencan, thencean=to think (pa. t. thohte); cogn. with Icel. thekkja; Dan. tænke; Sw. tänka; Ger. denken (pa. t. dachte); Goth. thagkjan (pa. t. thahta). Allied to thank (q. v.). Originally distinct from the impersonal verb thinken, but soon confused with it.] [METHINKS.]

A. Intransitive:

1. To occupy the mind on some subject; to have ideas; to revolve ideas in the mind; to cogitate; to reason; to exercise the power of thought; to have a succession of ideas or intellectual states; to perform any mental operation, whether of apprehension, judgment, or illation; to muse; to meditate.

"I think, but dare not speak."

Shakesp.: Macbeth, v. 1.

2. To judge; to form a conclusion; to determine; to be of opinion; to opine.

"She thinks he could not die."

Shakesp.: Venus and Adonis, 1,060.

3. To purpose, to mean, to design, to intend, to hope.

"Thinking to bar thee of succession, as Thou reft'st me of my lands."

Shakesp.: Cymbeline, iii. 3.

4. To imagine, to suppose, to fancy.

"Let him that thinketh he standeth, take heed lest he fall."—1 Corinth. x. 12.

5. To guess; to form an opinion or idea.

"Then Innocent ran in (for that was her name), and said to those within, Can you think who is at the door?"—Bunyan: Pilgrim's Progress, pt. ii.

6. To reflect, to recollect, to call to mind.

"Bid her think what a man is."—Shakesp.: Merry Wives, iii. 3.

¶ Followed by of, on, or upon.

"Think of that, a man of my kidney, think of that."—Shakesp.: Merry Wives, iii. 5.

7. To consider, to deliberate, to take thought. (Luke xii. 17.)

bōl, bōy; pōut, jōwł; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, ðis; sin, aș; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f. -cian, -tian = șan. -tion, -sion = șün;

-tion, -șion = zhün. -tious, -cious, -sious = șūs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bel, ðel.

8 To judge; to form an opinion or estimate.

"As you hear of me, so think of me."

Shakesp.: Much Ado, iv. 1.

*9. To presume, to venture.

"Think not to say within yourselves, We have Abraham to our Father."—Matthew iii. 9.

*10. To expect.

"Do you think

To find a woman without any fault?"

Colman: Comedies of Terence, p. 323.

B. Transitive:

1. To form or harbor in the mind; to conceive, to imagine.

"To think so base a thought."

Shakesp.: Merchant of Venice, ii. 7.

2. To design, to meditate.

"Charity thinketh no evil."—1 Corinthians xiii. 5.

3. To hold in opinion; to consider, to regard, to believe, to esteem.

"May I be bold to think these sprites."

Shakesp.: Tempest, iv. 1.

*4. To contrive, to plan.

*5. To make an object of thought; to form a conception of.

*C. Impersonally:

1. It appears to; it seems to. (Only used now in methinks.)

"Than is it wisdom, as it thinketh me To maken vertue of necessity."

Chaucer: C. T., 3,043.

2. To occur to.

"So that hym thinketh of a daie
A thousande yere till he maie see
The visage of Penelope."—Gower: C. A., iv.

¶ 1. To think of: To estimate; to esteem; to have an opinion.

"Think of me as you please."

Shakesp.: Twelfth Night, v.

2. To think on (or upon):

(1) To meditate, to reflect to consider.

(2) To light on or discover by meditation.

"If any order might be thought on."

Shakesp.: Henry V., iv. 5.

(3) To remember with favor; to have regard for; to pay attention to; to provide for.

"Think upon me, my God, for good."—Nehemiah v. 19.

3. To think long:

(1) To long for; to expect with longing or impatience.

"Long she thinks till he return again."

Shakesp.: Rape of Lucrece, 1,359.

(2) To think the time long; to weary; to suffer from ennui. (Scotch.)

*4. To think much: To grudge.

*5. To think scorn:

(1) To disdain to do an act as being beneath one; to scorn. (Esther iii. 6.)

(2) To feel deeply indignant; to feel that an act done or threatened is calculated to bring one into scorn or contempt.

*think, s. [THINK, v.] A thought.

"He thinks many a long think."

Browning: Ring and Book, vii. 914.

think'-a-ble, a. [Eng. think; -able.] Capable of being thought; conceivable, cogitable, imaginable.

"But what is the condition under which alone a relation is thinkable? It is thinkable only as of a certain order—as belonging, or not belonging, to some class of before-known relations."—Mill: System of Logic, § 41.

think'-ēr, s. [Eng. think; -er.]

1. One who thinks; especially one who thinks in a particular manner, as a close thinker, a deep thinker.

"He was able, here and there, to delude a superficial thinker with his new terms and reasonings; but the hardest task of all was, thoroughly to deceive him."—Atterbury: Sermons, vol. iv., ser. 4.

2. One who turns his attention to, or writes on, speculative subjects.

think'-ing, *thenk-yng, present part., a. & s. [THINK.]

A. As pr. par.: (See the verb.)

B. As adjective: Having the power or faculty of thought; capable of a regular train of thought; cogitative; as, Man is a thinking animal.

C. As subst.: The act or state of one who thinks; cogitation, thought, meditation, judgment, opinion, idea.

"I am wrapt in dismal thinkings."

Shakesp.: All's Well, v. 3.

think'-ing-lý, adv. [Eng. thinking; -ly.] By thinking, by thought.

thin'-lý, adv. [Eng. thin, a.; -ly.]

1. In a thin manner; not thickly or deeply; as, thinly clad.

*2. Slightly, insufficiently.

"This may help to thicken other proofs

That do demonstrate thinly."

Shakesp.: Othello, iii. 3.

3. In a thin, scattered manner; not densely or closely; scantily.

"A choice shrub, which he who passes by
With vacant mind, not seldom may observe Fair flowering in a thinly-peopled house."

Wordsworth: Excursion, bk. vi.

thin'-nēr, s. [Eng. thin, v.; -er.] One who or that which thins or makes thin.

thin'-nēss, s. [Eng. thin, a.; -ness.]

1. The quality or state of being thin; smallness of extent from one surface to its opposite.

"Those in the tree, though generally constructed under some overhanging branch, from the nature and thinness of their crust or wall, cannot be [proof against wet]."—Cook: First Voyage, bk. iii., ch. vi.

2. Tenuity, rareness.

3. Slimness, slenderness, leanness.

4. A state approaching to fluidity, or even fluidity; the opposite to spissitude.

"The extreme lightness of her [a bird's] furniture being appropriated to the thinness of that element."—More: Antidote against Atheism, bk. ii., ch. xi., § 13.

5. Rareness; the state of being scattered; paucity.

"In country villages Pope Leo the Seventh indulged a practice, through the thinness of the inhabitants, which opened a way for pluralities."—Ayliffe: Parergon.

6. Exility, smallness, fineness; want of fullness or volume; as, the thinness of a voice.

*thin'-nī-fy, v. t. [Eng. thin; i connect.; suff. -fy.] To make thin.

"The heart . . . doth so thinify the blood."—Urquhart: Rabelais, bk. iii., ch. iv.

thin'-nīng, pr. par., a. & s. [THIN, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As substantive:

1. The act or process of making thin or thinner.

2. That which is removed in the act or process of making anything thin.

"In conjunction with other checks and limits, all subservient to the same purpose, are the thinings which take place among animals, by their action upon one another."—Paley: Nat. Theol., ch. xxvi.

thin'-nīsh, a. [Eng. thin, a.; -ish.] Somewhat or rather thin thī-nō-, pref. [Gr. this (genit. thinos)=the beach, the shore.] Inhabiting or found on the shore.

thī-nō-cōr'-ī-dæ, subst. pl. [Lat. thinocor(us); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. idæ.]

Ornith.: Quail-snipes; a family of Grallæ, with two genera, Attagis and Thinocorus (q. v.).

thī-nōc'-ōr-ūs, s. [Pref. thino-, and Gr. choreuō=to dance. (Agassiz.)]

Ornith.: The type-genus of Thinocoridae, with two species, from La Plata, Chili, and Peru.

thī-nō-hy'-ūs, s. [Pref. thino-, and Gr. hys (genit. hyos)=a swine.]

Palæont.: A genus of Suidæ, abundant in the Upper Miocene of Oregon. It is allied to Dicotyles (q. v.), but has an additional premolar tooth and a much smaller brain-cavity.

thī-nō-lēs'-tēs, s. [Pref. thino-, and Gr. lēstēs=a robber.]

Palæont.: A genus of Limnotheridæ, from the Lower Eocene of Wyoming.

thī-nō-lite, s. [Pref. thino-, and Gr. lithos=a stone.]

Min.: A name given to a large shore deposit of tufaceous carbonate of lime, which contains pseudomorphs of a mineral believed to have originally been gaylussite (q. v.). E. S. Dana has pointed out that the angles of some of the crystals are not found to coincide with those of the latter mineral, and that the original mineral remains still unknown.

thī-ō-, pref. [Gr. theion=sulphur.] Having sulphur in its composition.

thio-alcohols, s. pl. [MERCAPTAN.]

thio-ethylic ether, s. [ETHYL-SULPHIDE.]

thio-urea, s. [SULPHUREA.]

thī-ō-bēn-zō'-īc, adj. [Pref. thio-, and Eng. benzoic.] Derived from or containing sulphur and benzoic acid.

thiobenzoic-acid, s.

Chem.: $\begin{cases} C_6H_5 \\ COSH \end{cases}$ Au analogue of thiactic acid.

Produced by mixing an alcoholic solution of potassium monosulphide with chloride of benzoyl. Hydrochloric acid added to the potash salt separates the acid as an oily body, which when left for some time deposits the acid in colorless crystals. When pure, it forms small rhombic tables, inodorous and tasteless, melts at 120°, is quite insoluble in water, slightly soluble in alcohol and ether, and easily in carbonic disulphide. It forms definite salts with bases.

thī-ō-bu-týr'-īc, a. [Prefix thio-, and English butyric.] Derived from or containing sulphur and butyric acid.

thiobutyric-acid, s.

Chemistry: C_4H_5OS . An acid homologous with thiactic acid, produced by the action of phosphoric protosulphide on butyric acid.

thī-ō-căp-rīn-ăl'-dīne, s. [Pref. thio-; English capric, and aldine.]

Chemistry: A compound analogous to thialdine, formed, according to Wagner, by the action of sulphydric acid on the ammonia compound of capric aldehyde. (Watts.)

thī-ō-car'-ba-mīde, s. [Pref. thio-, and English carbamide.] [SULPHUREA.]

thī-ō-car'-ban-īl, subst. [Prefix thio-; English carb(on), and anil(ine).]

Chemistry: $CSN(C_6H_5)_5$. Phenyllic mustard oil. Formed from the carbanilide by distillation with phosphoric anhydride, and by the action of phosphene on aniline. A colorless liquid, smelling like mustard oil, and boiling at 222°.

thī-ō-cărb-ăn'-īl-īde, s. [English thiocarbanil; -ide.]

Chemistry: $CS-NH(C_6H_5)-NH(C_6H_5)$. Formed by heating equivalent quantities of aniline and potash hydrate in alcoholic solution with excess of carbon sulphide. Dilute hydrochloric acid is added, and, after evaporation, the mass is crystallized from alcohol. It yields colorless laminae, melting at 144°, insoluble in water, very soluble in alcohol and ether.

thī-ō-chrōn'-īc, a. [Pref. thio-; second element doubtful.] Derived from or containing sulphur and chloroquinone.

thiochronic-acid, s.

Chem.: $C_5H_8S_4O_{14}$. Obtained as a potassium salt when a hot solution of perchloroquinone is mixed with concentrated aqueous acid sulphite of potassium.

thī-ōc'-īn-nōl, s. [Pref. thio-; Eng. cinn(yl), and suff. -ol.]

Chem.: C_9H_8S . A pulverulent substance formed, with sulphide of ammonium, by the action of sulphydric acid on hydrocinnamide, $C_{27}H_{24}N_2+4H_2S=3C_9H_8S+(NH_4)_2S$.

thī-ō-crē'-sōl, s. [Pref. thio-, and Eng. cresol.]

Chem. (pl.): $C_6H_4 < \begin{smallmatrix} CH_3 \\ SH \end{smallmatrix}$ Toly hydrosulphides.

Produced from the three isomeric toluene sulphonic acids by reducing the corresponding chlorides with zinc and hydrochloric acid. (1) Ortho-, shining laminae, melting at 15°, boiling at 188°. (2) Meta-, liquid, not solid, at -10°. (3) Para-, large laminae, melting at 43°, boiling at 188°.

thī-ō-cy'-ăn'-īc, a. [Pref. thio-, and Eng. cyanic.] Derived from or containing sulphur and cyanic acid.

thiocyanic-acid, s.

Chem.: $CHNS$. Obtained by decomposing lead thiocyanate in water, with sulphydric acid gas. Its solution is colorless, very acid, and not poisonous. Soluble thiocyanates give a blood-red color with ferric salts, thus affording a delicate test for hydrocyanic acid, if the latter be first converted into thiocyanate by yellow ammonium sulphide.

thiocyanic-ether, s.

Chemistry (plural): Normal ethyl thiocyanate, $C < \begin{smallmatrix} N \\ S(C_2H_5) \end{smallmatrix}$, is a mobile, colorless, strongly-refracting liquid, with an odor like that of mercaptan. Boils at 146 degrees. Ethyl isothiocyanate= $N < \begin{smallmatrix} CS \\ C_2H_5 \end{smallmatrix}$. Differs in all properties from the normal compound. It boils at 134°, has the irritating odor of mustard-oil, and unites directly with ammonia. These ethers exhibit isomerism like those of the alcohol cyanates and isocyanates, as clearly shown in the case of the ethyl compounds.

thī-ō-dī-ă-cēt'-īc, a. [Pref. thio-; di-, and Eng. acetic.] [THIODIGLYCOLLIC.]

thī-ō-dī-glý-cōl'-lā-mīde, s. [Pref. thio-; di-, and Eng. glycollamide.]

Chemistry: $\begin{smallmatrix} C_2H_5O \\ C_2H_5O \end{smallmatrix} > (NH_2)_2S$. Obtained by the action of sulphide of ammonium on chloracetamide in alcoholic solution. Recrystallized from water it forms small white octahedrons, which melt when heated.

thī-ō-dī-glý-cōl'-līc, a. [Pref. thio-; di-, and Eng. glycollic.] Derived from or pertaining to sulphur and glycollic acid.

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camēl, hēr, thēre; pīne, pīt, sīre, sīr, marīne; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whē, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unīte, cūr, rūle, fūll; trȳ, Sȳrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

thiodiglycollic-acid, s.

Chem.: $C_2H_2O > S(HO)_2$. Formed by boiling thiodiglycollamide with baryta-water as long as ammonia is evolved. By decomposing the lead salt and evaporating the filtrate the acid is obtained in crystals.

thi-ō-dī-gly-cōl'-līm-īde, s. [Pref. thio-; dī-; Eng. glycol, and imide.]

Chem.: $C_2H_2O > HNS$. Formed by the dehydration of acid thiodiglycollate of ammonia, and deposited in thin prismatic needles or laminae from a hot aqueous solution. It is sparingly soluble in cold water, melts at 128°, and sublimes at a higher temperature.

thi-ō-for'-mic, a. [Pref. thio-, and Eng. formic.] Derived from or containing sulphur and formic acid.

thioformic-acid, s.

Chem.: A compound formed in small quantity by the action of sulphydric acid on formate of lead. It yields small transparent crystals, having an alliaceous odor, is insoluble in water, and melts at 120°.

thi-ō-fū'-cūs-ōl, s. [Prefix thio-, and English fucosol.]

Chem.: A substance produced by treating fucosol in alcoholic solution with sulphydric acid.

thi-ō-fūr'-fōl, s. [THIOFURFUROL.]

Chem.: C_5H_4OS . Thiofurfural. A white crystalline powder, formed by the action of ammonium sulphide on furfural, or of sulphydric acid on furfamide.

thi-ō-fūr'-fu-rōl, s. [Pref. thio-, and Eng. furfural.] [THIOFURFOL.]

thi-ō-i'-sā-tyde, s. [Prefix thio-, and English isatyde.]

Chem.: $C_{16}H_{12}N_2S_2O_2$. Formed by passing hydrogen sulphide into an alcoholic solution of isatin. It is a grayish-yellow, pulverulent, uncrystallizable substance, which softens in hot water and dissolves in alcohol.

thi-ō-mē-lān'-īc, adj. [Pref. thio-, and English melanic.] Derived from or containing sulphur and melanic acid.

thiomelanic-acid, s.

Chem.: A sulphureted acid, found in the black mass produced by heating alcohol with excess of sulphuric acid. It is capable of forming salts with potash and other bases.

thi-ōn, pref. [THIO-.]

thi-ō-nām'-īc, adj. [Pref. thion-, and English amic.] Derived from or containing sulphurous acid and ammonia.

thionamic-acid, s.

Chem.: $NH_3 \cdot SO_2$. Produced by the action of dry ammonia gas on sulphurous anhydride. It is a crystalline volatile substance, very soluble in water, in which it quickly undergoes complete decomposition.

thi-ōn'-ā-mīde, s. [Prefix thion-, and English amide.]

Chem.: $N_2H_4(SO)$. Produced by the action of sulphurous chloride on dry ammonia. It is a white pulverulent, non-crystalline solid.

thi-ō-nūr'-īc, a. [Pref. thion-, and Eng. uric.] Derived from or containing sulphurous and uric acids.

thionuric-acid, s.

Chem.: $C_4H_5N_3SO_6$. Formed by the action of sulphurous acid and ammonia on uric acid or alloxan. On evaporating its solution, it yields a crystalline mass consisting of fine needles; is permanent in the air, has a very sour taste, and is very soluble in water. It is dibasic, and forms acid and neutral crystalline salts with bases.

thi-ōn-yl, s. [Gr. theion=sulphur; -yl.]

Chem.: SO . The radical of the sulphurous compounds.

thi-ōn-yl-ām'-īc, a. [Eng. thionyl, and amic.] [THIONAMIC.]

thi-ōn-yl'-ā-mīde, s. [Eng. thionyl, and amide.] [THIONAMIDE.]

thi-ō-phē-nōl, s. [Pref. thio-, and Eng. phenol.]

Chem.: C_6H_5SH . Formed by the action of pentasulphide of phosphorus on phenol. It is a colorless, mobile, fetid liquid, boiling at 168°, is insoluble in water, but dissolves easily in alcohol and ether.

thi-ō-phōs-phām'-īc, a. [Pref. thio-, and Eng. phosphamic.] Derived from or pertaining to sulphur and phosphamic acid.

thiophosphamic-acid, s.

Chem.: $P(NH_2)_2H_2SO_2$. Produced by the action of sulphochloride of phosphorus on aqueous ammonia. It has not been isolated, but forms a series of salts with bases, nearly all of which are uncrystallizable.

thi-ō-phōs-phō-dī-ām'-īc, a. [Pref. thio-; Eng. phosphodiam(ide), and suff. -ic.] Derived from or pertaining to sulphur and phosphodiamic acid.

thiophosphodiamic-acid, s.

Chem.: $P(H_2N)_2HSO$. Formed by the action of ammonia gas on sulphochloride of phosphorus. It is obtained as a white mass, easily soluble in water, is monobasic, and forms a series of salts with bases.

thi-or'-sau-īte (au as ow), s. [After Thiorsa, Iceland, where found; u connect., and suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: The same as ANORTHITE (q.v.).

thi-ō-sin'-ā-mīne, s. [Pref. thio-, and English sinamine.]

Chem.: $C_4H_5NS \cdot NH_3$. Formed by the union of mustard oil with ammonia. It is obtained in colorless, prismatic crystals, having a bitter taste, is soluble in water, alcohol, and ether, melts when heated, but cannot be sublimed.

thi-ō-sin-ān'-īl-īne, s. [Eng. thiosin(amine), and aniline.]

Chemistry: $N_2(CS(C_2H_5)(C_6H_5)H_2)$. Obtained by pouring oil of mustard into an equivalent of aniline dissolved in alcohol. It separates in foliated, colorless crystals, destitute of taste and smell, insoluble in water, very soluble in alcohol and ether, and shows but little tendency to combine with acids. Melts at 95°.

thi-ō-sūl-phūr'-īc, a. [Pref. thio-, and English sulphuric.] Derived from or containing sulphur and sulphuric acid.

thiosulphuric-acid, subst. [HYPOSULPHUROUS-ACID.]

thi-ō-va-lēr'-īc, adj. [Pref. thio-, and English valeric.] Derived from or containing sulphur and valeric acid.

thiovaleric-acid, s.

Chem.: The product of the action of phosphoric pentachloride on valerianic acid.

thir, a. [Icel.] These. (Scotch.)

"Thir breeks o' mine, my only pair,
That ance were plush o' guid blue hair."

Burns: Tam O'Shanter.

thīrd, thirde, thrid, thridde, thyrd, a. & s. [Properly thrid, from A. S. thrida, from threo, thri = three (q.v.); cogn. with Dutch derde; Icel. thridhi; Dan. tredie; Sw. tredje; Ger. dritte; Goth. thridja; Wel. tryde, trydedd; Gael. & Irish trian; Russ. tretii; Lith. trėczias; Lat. tertius; Gr. tritos; Sansc. tritiya. A. As adjective:

1. The ordinal of three; coming next after the second; coming after two of the same class.

"He was wounded the thrid tyme."

Robert de Brunne, p. 8.

2. Constituting or being one of three equal parts into which a whole is or may be divided.

"The third part of a minute."

Shakesp.: Midsummer Night's Dream, ii. 2.

B. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The third part of anything; one of three equal parts.

*2. The sixtieth part of a second.

"Divide the natural day into twenty-four equal parts, an hour into sixty minutes, a minute into sixty seconds, a second into sixty thirds."—Holder: On Time.

II. Technically:

1. Law (pl.): The third part of the estate of a deceased husband, which, by the law of some countries, the widow is entitled to enjoy during her life; corresponding to the widow's dower of this country.

2. Music:

(1) An interval consisting of a major tone and a minor tone, as from C to E; called a major third.

(2) An interval consisting of a major or minor tone and a semitone, as from A to C; called a minor third.

(3) The upper of the two notes including such intervals.

Third Estate, s.

1. In Great Britain the Commonalty or Commons, represented in the legislature by the House of Commons.

2. French Hist.: The Tiers Etat (q.v.).

Third-order, s.

Eccles. & Church Hist.: A term which arose from the fact that when St. Francis had founded the Friars Minor (1209) for men, and St. Clare had founded the Poor Clares (1221) for women under a rule presented by him, he established a congregation called the Brothers and Sisters of Penance as a sort of middle term between the world and the cloister, with a separate rule, the members of which, men and women, married or single, "should be bound by rule to dress more soberly, fast more strictly, pray more regularly, hear mass more frequently, and practice works of mercy more systematically than ordinary persons living in the world." They had to undergo a year's novitiate and to take a simple vow to observe the rule. Many of these persons, in course of time, wished to live in community, and so congregations of the Third Order arose—true Franciscans with a rule of their own, distinct from that of the Friars Minors and that of the Poor Clares. Pope Benedict XIII., in the Bull Paterna sedis, speaks of the Third Order "as a true and proper order, uniting in one seculars scattered all over the world and regulars living in community; distinguished from all confraternities as having its own rule, approved by the Holy See, novitiate, profession, and a habit of determinate form and material" (in the case of persons living in the world consisting of a brown scapular worn under the ordinary dress). The Dominicans have a Third Order, instituted by St. Dominic (1170-1221), but in what year is uncertain; the Augustinians established one at the beginning of the fifteenth, and Minims at the beginning of the sixteenth century and their example has been followed by the Servites, the Carmelites, and the Trappists.

*third-penny, s.

Old Eng. Law: A third part of the profits of fines and penalties imposed at the county court, which was the perquisite of the earl.

third-person, s.

Gram.: The person spoken of.

thīrl'-a-ble, thīrle-a-bylle, adj. [Eng. thīrl (1), v.; -able.] Capable of being penetrated or pierced; penetrable.

thīrl'-age (age as īg), s. [English thīrl (2), v.; -age.]

Scots Law: A species of servitude, formerly very common in Scotland, and also prevalent in England, by which the proprietors and other possessors of lands were bound to carry the grain produced on the lands to a particular mill to be ground, to bōil, bōy; pōut, jōwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, ðis; sin, aș; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f. -cian, -tian = shān. -tion, -sion = shūn; ðion. -sion = zhūn. -tious, -cious, -sious = shūs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bel. del.

which mill the lands were said to be thirled or astricted, and also to pay a certain proportion of the grain, varying in different cases, as a remuneration for the grinding, and for the expense of the erection and maintenance of the mill. The principal duty chargeable in thirlage was multure (q.v.). There were also smaller duties called sequels, which fell to the servants of the mill, according to the particular usage of each mill.

thirl'-ing, s. [THIRL (1), v.]

Mining: A worked space connecting the rooms of a mine. The rooms are galleries proceeding regularly (in coal mines) from the dip-head or main-level, and the unworked space forms a wall. By cutting gaps in this wall at regular intervals, the wall becomes a row of pillars, the said connecting workings are thirlings.

thirst, thurst, thurste, threst, thrist, thruste, s. [A.S. thurst, thyrst, thirst; cogn. with Dut. dorst; Icel. thorsti; Dan. tørst; Sw. törst; Ger. durst; Goth. thaurstei.] [THIRST, v.]

I. Lit.: A term used to denote the sensations arising from the want of fluid nutriment; the desire, uneasiness, or suffering arising from want of drink; great desire for drink.

"Though we cool our thirst at the mouth of the river."
—Bp. Taylor: On Set Forms of Liturgie, § 29.

¶ As perspiration and other discharges carry off moisture from the body, the sensation of thirst arises, and is generally proportionate to the necessity for a fresh supply of liquid. Of all beverages the only part which is essentially required to slake thirst is the water which they contain. Abnormal thirst exists in many diseases; insatiable thirst (Polydipsia) is a symptom of Diuresis.

II. Figuratively:

1. Dryness, drought.

"The rapid current . . . through veins
Of porous earth with kindly thirst updrawn, Rose a fresh fountain." Milton; P. L., iv. 228.

2. A want and eager longing or desire after anything. (Now followed by for or after, formerly by of.)

"[Thou] hast allayed
The thirst I had of knowledge."
Milton; P. L., viii. 8.

thirst, thirste, thurste, thurst, thrist, v. i. & t. [A.S. thyrstan; cogn. with Dut. dorsten; Icel. thyrsta; Dan. tørste; Sw. törsta; Ger. dürsten; Goth. thairsan (pa. t. thars) = to be dry, to thirst; Sansc. tarsha = to thirst; trish = to thirst; Ir. tart = thirst, drought; Gr. tersomai = to become dry; Lat. torreo = to parch; terra (for tersa) = dry ground. From the same root come terrace, torrid, test, toast, tureen.]

A. Intransitive:

1. Lit.: To feel thirst; to experience a painful sensation for want of drink; to have desire to drink; to be thirsty.

"The people thirsted there for water."—Exodus xvii. 3.
2. Fig.: To have a vehement desire or longing for anything.

"And cruel and blood-thirsty men Would thirst for blood no more."
Cowper: Olney Hymns, xxxiii.

B. Transitive: To have a thirst for; to desire to drink.

"He seeks his keeper's flesh, and thirsts his blood."
Prior: Solomon, i. 203.

thirst'-ēr, s. [English thirst, v.; -er.] One who thirsts.

thirst'-ī-lŷ, adv. [Eng. thirsty; -ly.] In a thirsty manner.

"They heare hungrily and thirstily, but it is but to catch advantages."—Bp. Hall: The Hypocrite.

thirst'-ī-nēss, subst. [Eng. thirsty; -ness.] The quality or state of being thirsty; thirst; vehement desire or longing for anything.

"They who be athirst in the night, if they sleep upon it, lose their thirstiness, although they drink never a drop."—P. Holland: Plutarch, p. 599.

thirst'-lēss, a. [Eng. thirst; -less.] Not having thirst; not having vehement desire for anything.

thirst'-ŷ, thirst-ie, adj. [A.S. thurstig; cogn. with Dut. dorstig; Icel. thyrstugr; Danish & Swed. törstig; O. H. Ger. durstac, dursteg; Ger. durstig.]

I. Lit.: Feeling a sensation of pain or uneasiness for want of drink; suffering for want of drink; having thirst; suffering from thirst.

"Eager to drink, down rush the thirsty crowd, Hang o'er the banks, and trouble all the flood."
Rowe: Lucan; Pharsalia, iv.

II. Figuratively:

1. Dry; lacking in moisture; parched.

"The thirsty land [shall become] springs of water."—Isaiah xxxv. 7.

2. Having a vehement desire or longing for anything.

"To be thirsty after tottering honor."

Shakesp.: Pericles, iii. 2.

thir'-teēn, thret-tene, a. & s. [A.S. threótēne, threótýne, from threó=three, and tēn, týn=ten; cogn. with Dutch dertien; Icel. threttán; Dan. tretten; Sw. tretton; Ger. dreizehn.]

A. As adj.: Ten and three.

"Speaking at the one end, I heard it return the voice thirteen times."—Bacon: Nat. Hist.

B. As substantive:

1. The number which consists of three and ten.
2. A symbol representing thirteen units, as 13 or xiii.

thir'-teēnth, a. & s. [A.S. threóteódha; Icel. threttandi.]

A. As adjective:

1. The ordinal of thirteen; the third after the tenth.

"If she could prove a thirteenth task for him Who twelve achiev'd, the work would me beseem."
Beaumont: Psyche.

2. Constituting or being one of thirteen equal parts into which a whole is or may be divided.

B. As substantive:

I. Ord. Lang.: One of thirteen equal parts into which a whole is or may be divided.

II. Music: An interval forming the octave of the sixth, or sixth of the octave.

¶ Chord of the thirteenth: A chord called by some a suspension; by others a secondary seventh. It consists generally of the third, seventh, and thirteenth of the dominant, and is used both in the major and minor modes.

thir'-ti-eth, a. & s. [A.S. thritigódha.]

A. As adjective:

1. The tenth thrice told; the next in order after the twenty-ninth; the ordinal of thirty.

2. Constituting or being one of thirty equal parts into which a whole is or may be divided.

B. As subst.: One of thirty equal parts into which a whole is or may be divided.

thir'-tŷ, thret-ty, thrit-ti, thrit-ty, a. & s. [A.S. thritig, thritig, from thri, threó=three, and suff. -tig=ten; cogn. with Dut. dertig; Icel. thrijátíu; Dan. trediv; Sw. trettio; Ger. dreizig.]

A. As adj.: Thrice ten; ten three times repeated; twenty and ten.

"Kyng Egbrigt adde ybe kyng thre and thritty yer, Thet folc of Denemarch hyder com, as yt adde y-do er." Robert of Gloucester, p. 259.

B. As substantive:

1. The number which consists of three times ten.
2. A symbol which represents thirty units, as xxx, or 30.

¶ The Thirty Tyrants: The thirty magistrates appointed by Sparta over Athens at the termination of the Peloponnesian war. They were overthrown in B. C. 403 after only one year's reign.

thirty-nine articles. [ARTICLE, B. IV.]

thirty-two, s.

Print.: A sheet of paper which folds up into thirty-two leaves or sixty-four pages. Usually written 32mo.

Thirty-years' war, s.

History: The name given to a European war, or rather a succession of wars, which lasted for thirty years (1618-1648), and in which Austria, most of the Catholic princes of Germany, and Spain were engaged on one side throughout, but against different antagonists. The contest was virtually a renewal of the struggles which took place in the days of Charles V.—Protestantism asserting itself, and Papacy determined if possible to keep it down. France took an active part on the Protestant side; for, though Richelieu oppressed the Protestants in France, he helped those of Germany in order to weaken that Power, and so injure a dangerous rival. There were three distinct periods in the struggle. In the first Austria, under Wallenstein, was completely victorious, and threatened to subdue all Germany. In the second the Protestants, under Gustavus Adolphus, carried all before them; and in the third victory was more uncertain and more equally divided. Peace was established by the Treaty of Westphalia (1648), which guaranteed religious liberty to both Lutherans and Calvinists, and made extensive territorial changes at the expense of Austria and Germany. France obtained Alsace (which became German again in 1871), and the State of Brandenburg received still larger additions; these were in 1701 merged in the new kingdom of Prussia, afterward the nucleus of the German Empire (1871).

this, thes, a. or pron. [A.S. dhes (masc.), dheos (fem.), dhis (neut.); cogn. with Dut. deze; Icel. thessi (masc. & fem.), thetta (neut.); O. H. Ger. deser; M. H. Ger. disir; Ger. dieser. The modern plural form is these, those being used as the pl. of that, but both forms are really plurals of this, the Mid. Eng. word for those being tho, thoo, from A.S. dhā, nom. pl. of the def. article. This is formed of the two pronominal bases, tha (seen in that, thither, &c.) and sa=he.]

1. Used to denote something that is present or near in place or time, or that has been just mentioned.

"And whanne the tilieris sighen him; thei thoughten withinne hemself and seiden, this is the oir, sle we him that the eritage be oure."—Wycliffe: Luke xx.

2. This is frequently used as a substitute for what has preceded; as—

"When they heard this, they were pricked in their heart."—Acts ii. 37.

Where this refers to the words of Peter just spoken. It also frequently represents a word, a sentence, or a clause, and in some cases it refers to something to be immediately said or done.

"But know this, that if the goodman of the house had known in what watch the thief would come, he would have watched and would not have suffered his house to be broken up."—Matthew xxiv. 43.

3. This is used absolutely to denote present place, state, condition, or the like.

"O Antony, I have followed thee to this."

Shakesp.: Antony and Cleopatra, v. 1.

4. Used in reference to time, this may refer to:
(1) The present time; as, this day, this week. It is also frequently used in this sense absolutely, as the present time, hour, &c.

"Between this and supper."

Shakesp.: Coriolanus, iv. 3.

(2) Time past; the time immediately before the present.

"Whereon this month I have been hammering."

Shakesp.: Two Gentlemen, i. 3.

(3) Time to come; futurity.

"This night I'll waste in sorrow."

Shakesp.: Venus and Adonis, 583.

¶ (1) This is often used in connection with numbers instead of the plural these, the sum being considered, as it were, a total.

"Which for this nineteen years we have let slip."

Shakesp.: Measure for Measure, i. 3.

(2) Shakespeare used the phrases this even, this night, in the sense of last even, last night.

"My troublous dream this night doth make me sad."

Shakesp.: Henry VI., Pt. II., i. 2.

5. This, when used as opposed or correlative to that, refers properly to the nearest person or object, that referring to the more distant. But the two words are frequently used to denote reference indefinitely:

"Two ships,
Of Corinth that, of Epidaurus this."

Shakesp.: Comedy of Errors, i. 1.

When used in reference to things spoken of, this refers to that last mentioned; that to a thing previously mentioned—

"Their judgment in this we may not, and in that we need not follow."—Hooker.

Sometimes it is used in opposition to other:

"Consider the arguments which the author had to write this, or to design the other before you arraign him."
—Dryden.

¶ (1) This is sometimes found as a contraction for this is

"This a good friar, belike."

Shakesp.: Measure for Measure, v. 1.

(2) It is used, not to define or point to something, but to designate things or persons as sufficiently known in their qualities, sometimes in a good, oftener in a bad sense.

"Where is this Hector?"

Shakesp.: Troilus and Cressida, v. 5.

(3) By this: By or before this time; as, by this the man was gone.

* (4) Used for thus or so:

"What am I that thou shouldst condemn me this?"

Shakesp.: Venus and Adonis, 205.

This'-bē, subst. [Latin=a Babylonian maiden described by Ovid (Met. iv. 55) as committing suicide because she believed her lover, Pyramus, to be dead.]

Astron.: [ASTEROID, 88.].

this'-nēss, s. [Eng. this; -ness.] The state or quality of being this; hæcceity. [THATNESS.]

this'-tle (tle as el), *this-til, *thys-tylle, s. [A. S. thisel; cogn. with Dut. distel; Icel. thisill; Dan. tidse; Sw. tistel; O. H. Ger. distil, distula; Ger. distel.]

1. Ord. Lang.: A name given to many plants with prickly stems, leaves and involucre, or having at least one of these parts prickly. Most are composites of the tribe Cynareæ. Among these are the Spear thistle, Carduus lanceolatus, the emblem of Scotland; the Blessed thistle, Carduus benedictus; the Carline thistle, and many others. Britten & Holland enumerate forty-six species having thistle as the last word of their compound name. Some other plants are called thistles; thus the Mexican thistle, Argemone mexicana, is a poppy with prickly leaves.

2. Bot.: (1) The genus Carduus (q. v.). [CARLINA, ONOPORDON.]

¶ Order of the Thistle: A Scottish order of knighthood, sometimes called the Order of St. Andrew. It was instituted by James VII. (James II. of England), in 1687, when eight knights were nominated. It fell into abeyance during the reign of William and Mary, and was revived by Queen Anne in 1703. As at present constituted, the Order consists of the British Sovereign and knights to the number of sixteen. The insignia consist of a collar, badge, jewel, star, and ribbon. The collar is composed of golden thistles and leaves connected by crossed sprigs of rue, enameled. The badge is a golden eight-pointed star, whereon is an enameled figure of St. Andrew, bearing in front of him his cross in silver; it is worn attached to the collar. The jewel is worn round the neck with the ribbon. The star is of four points, with a St. Andrew's Cross embroidered in silver upon it. In the center is a green and gold thistle within a circle of green, bearing the motto in golden letters. Ribbon, dark-green. Motto: Nemo me impune lacessit. Besides the knights ordinary, there are extra knights (princes), and a dean, a secretary, the lion-king-at-arms, and the gentleman usher of the green rod.

Insignia of Order of the Thistle.
a. Star; b. Collar; c. Badge.

thistle-crown, s. A gold coin of James VI. of Scotland (James I. of England), of the value of 97½ cents. It bore on the obverse a rose, and on the reverse a thistle, both crowned.

thistle-digger, s. A long narrow spade for cutting the roots of thistles below the crown of the root, and lifting them from the ground.

thistle-down, s. The down or winged seeds of the thistle.

"As a snow-flake falls on snow-flake,
As a leaf drops on a river,
As the thistle-down on water."
Longfellow: Hiawatha, xii.

thistle-finch, s. The gold-finch (q. v.).

thistle-hemp, s.

Bot.: Cannabis sativa. (Britten & Holland.)

thistle-warp, subst. A bird, supposed to be the goldfinch.

this'-lŷ (st as s), a. [Eng. thisl(e); -y.]

1. Literally:

1. Overgrown or abounding with thistles.

"While the quail clamors for his running mate, Wide o'er the thislŷ lawn, as swells the breeze."
Thomson: Summer, 1,658.

2. Resembling a thistle; prickly.

*II. Fig.: Sharp, prickling, pricking.

"In such a world, so thorny, where none
Find happiness unblighted, or, if found, Without some thislŷ sorrow at its side," Cowper: Task, iv. 335.

thith'-ēr, *thed-er, *thid-er, *thyd-er, *thid-ir, adv. [A. S. dhider, dhyder; cogn. with Icel. thadra=there; Goth. thathro=thence; Sansc. tatra=there, thither.]

1. To that place; opposed to hither.

"And thither came John of Thirlestaine, And thither came William of Deloraine."
Scott: Lay of the Last Minstrel, ii. 33.

¶ The place of thither has been largely taken in ordinary language by there.

*2. To that end; to that point.

¶ Hither and thither: To this place and to that; one way and another; as, to run hither and thither in perplexity.

thith'-ēr-tō, adverb. [Eng. thither, and to.] To that point; so far.

thith'-ēr-ward, *thid-er-ward, *thid-er-ward, *thydreward, adv. [A. S. thiderward.] Toward that place; in that direction.

"Through bright are the waters of Sing-su-hay,
And the golden floods that thitherward stray."
Moore: Paradise and the Peri.

thit'-seē, s. [THEETSEE.]

thlād-i-ān'-thā, s. [Gr. thladias=a eunuch, and anthos=bloom.]

Bot.: A genus of Cucurbitaceæ. Thladiantha dubia is a pubescent Indian climber with oblong, succulent, twelve-ribbed fruit, which is eaten by natives of the Himalaya mountains.

thlās'-pī, s. [Lat., from Gr. thlaspi=a crucifer, perhaps shepherd's purse.]

Bot.: Penny-cress, the typical genus of Thlaspidæ (q. v.). Herbs with rosulate radical and hastate cauline leaves; pod short, laterally compressed, valves winged at the back; cells two to eight seeded. Thlaspi arvense is the Mithridate Mustard, T. perfoliatum, the Perfoliate, and T. alpestre, the Alpine Penny-cress. The second and third are rare, the first not very common. [PENNY-CRESS.]

thlās-pīd'-ē-ā, thlās'-pī-dā, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. thlaspi (i); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Bot.: A family of Pleurorhizæ. Pouch compressed, with the dissepiments very narrow in the narrowest diameter; valves keeled or winged.

thlīp'-sis, s. [Gr.=pressure, compression, from Gr. thlibō=to press.]

Med.: Compression; especially, constriction of vessels by an external cause; oppression.

thlīp-sūr'-ā, s. [Gr. thlipsis=pressure, and oura=the tail.]

Zool.: A genus of Cythridæ. Three species from the Upper Silurian.

thō, pron. [THIS.] Those, the.

thō, adv. [A. S. dhā.] Then.

"Tho wrapping up her wreathed stern around Lept fierce upon his shield."
Spenser: F. Q., I. i. 18.

thō, conj. [See def.] An abbreviation of though (q. v.).

thō'-an, a. [Modern Latin tho(us); -an.] Of, belonging to, or resembling the section Thous (q. v.).

"The Thoon group represents in form the wolf on a reduced scale."—Naturalist's Library, iv. 193.

thof, conjunction. [See def.] A provincial form of though, the old guttural being changed to f, as in rough.

thōle (1), thowl, thowel, thol, tol, tholle, subst. [A. S. thol; cogn. with Dut. dol; Icel. thollr=a tree, a thole; Dan. tol=a stopple, a stopper, a thole; Sw. tall=a pine-tree. Probably connected with thill (q. v.).]

*1. A cart-pin. (Palsgrave.)

2. Husband.: The nib, pin, or handle of a scythe-snath.

3. Naut.: A pin inserted in the gunwale of a boat to serve as a fulcrum for the oar in rowing. They are arranged in pairs, the space between forming one kind of rowlock. Tholes are shown on the gunwales of ancient Assyrian boats.

"The sound of their oars on the tholes had died in the distance."
Longfellow: Evangeline, ii. 2.

thole-pin, s. The same as THOLE (3).

thōle (2), s. [Latin tholus, from Greek tholos=a dome.]

Architecture:

1. The same as THOLUS (q. v.).

2. The scutcheon or knot at the center of a timber-vault.

3. A place in temples where votive offerings were suspended.

"Let altars smoke and tholes expect our spoils."
Fuinus Troes.

thōle, thol-en, tho-li-en, verb t. & i. [A. S. tholian=to endure, to suffer; cogn. with Icel. thola; Dan. taale; Sw. tåla; M. H. Ger. dolen, doln; O. H. Ger. dolēn, tholōn; Goth. thulan; M. H. German duld; Ger. geduld=patience. From the same root as Lat. tollo=to raise, tolero=to tolerate.]

A. Transitive: To suffer, to endure, to bear, to undergo.

"A wel vayr compaynye al so there com
Of holy men, that wule tholede martyrdom.
Vppe vayre wyte stedes, & in vayre armure also."
Robert of Gloucester, p. 407.

B. Intrans.: To wait. (Scotch.)

thō'-lē-ite, s. [After Tholei, where found; suff. -ite (Petro.).]

Petrol.: A name given by Steininger to a rock which he took for a compound of albite and sphene. A subsequent analysis showed that it was but a dolerite (q. v.).

thōl'-ich-thŷs, s. [Greek tholos=a dome, and ichthys=a fish.]

Ichthy.: A pseudo-genus of Teleostean Fishes, founded on what are probably immature individuals of the Cyttidæ, Squamipennes, &c.

tholichthys-stage, s.

Ichthy.: A stage in the development of certain Teleostean Fishes, in which the young differ so widely from the adult as, in many cases, to have been taken for types of distinct genera.

"In the Tholichthys-stage of Pomacanthus the frontal bone is prolonged into a straight lancet-shaped process, nearly half as long as the body; the supra-scapular and præopercular processes cover and hide the dorsal and ventral fins. The plates attached to the shoulder girdle remain persistent until the young fish has assumed the form of the adult."—Gunther: Study of Fishes, pp. 172, 173.

thōl'-ō-bāte, s. [Gr. tholos=a dome, and basis=a base.]

Arch.: A cupola and a base; that part of a building on which a cupola is placed.

thō'-lūs, s. [Lat., from Gr. tholos=a dome.]

Arch.: An appellation given to buildings of a circular form. Vitruvius uses it to signify the roof of a circular building. Now frequently applied to the lantern which surmounts a dome. Specifically applied at Athens to the round chamber or Rotunda, in which the Prytanes dined.

thō-mā'-ite (th as t), s. [After Prof. Thomae, of Wiesbaden; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A doubtful species, said to be a carbonate of iron, occurring in pyramidal crystals of the orthorhombic system. Found at Bleisbach in the Siebengebirge.

Thōm'-as-ite (Th as T), s. [From John Thomas, M. D., born in London, 1805, died at Worcester, Mass., 1871.]

Church Hist.: A controversial name sometimes given to the Christadelphians, from the fact that Dr. Thomas organized them into a separate religious body. They believe that immortality is the reward of the righteous, i. e., of those who receive the truth and are baptized, and that others will perish after punishment proportioned to their misdeeds or want of faith. They do not believe in the Trinity or in a personal devil.

Thō-mē'-an (Th as T), s. [See def.]

Church Hist.: One of a body of Christians on the Malabar coast, said to be descendants of the converts of St. Thomas.

Thōm'-ism (Th as T), s. [See def.]

Church Hist.: One of the two great schools of scholasticism, the other being Scotism (q. v.). It derived its name from its founder, St. Thomas Aquinas (1227-74), the great Dominican doctor. In theology Thomism followed the doctrines of Augustine as to free will and grace, and held that the Virgin Mary was sanctified after her body was informed by the soul; its philosophy was a moderate Realism. As a system it rests on the Summa of St. Thomas, which is divided into three parts: (1) Of God in himself and as the Creator; (2) of God as the end of creatures, and of the actions which lead us to, or separate us from Him; and (3) of the Incarnation, the Sacraments, and the Last Things (i. e., Death, Judgment, Heaven, and Hell.) The Dominicans naturally adopted and defended Thomism.

Thōm'-ist (Th as T), adj. & subst. [Eccles. Lat. Thomista=a follower of St. Thomas Aquinas.] [THOMISM.]

A. As adj.: Of, belonging to, or connected with the theology of St. Thomas Aquinas.

"The old Scotist and Thomist theologies were still maintained."—Adams & Arnold: Cath. Dict., p. 274.

B. As subst.: A follower of St. Thomas Aquinas in theology and philosophy.

"The adverse sects of Thomists and Scotists filled Europe with their noisy disputes."—G. H. Lewes: Hist. Philos. (ed. 1880), ii. 87.

thō'-mō-mŷs (th as t), s. [Gr. thōmos=a heap, and mŷs=a mouse.]

Zool.: A genus of Geomyinæ, distinguished from the type-genus by having the upper incisors without grooves. There are two species, ranging from the Upper Missouri and Upper Columbia Rivers to Hudson's Bay.

bōil, bōy; pōūt, jōwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, țhis; sin, aş; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f. -cian, -tian = şan. -tion, -sion = şhūn; -țion, -șion = zhūn. -tious. -cious, -sious = şhūs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bəl, dəl.

Thöm'-sën, s. [A Dutch physician.] (See compound.)

Thomsen's disease, subst. An apparently congenital disease affecting the voluntary muscles with stiffness and contraction after a period of inaction.

thöm'-sën-ô-lite (th as t), s. [After Dr. Julius Thomsen, of Copenhagen; o connect., and Gr. lithos = a stone.]

Min.: A mineral resulting from the alteration of cryolite (q. v.). Crystallization monoclinic, occurring in prisms with horizontal striæ, and also massive resembling chalcidony. Hardness, 2.5-4; specific gravity, 2.74-2.76; luster, vitreous, on some faces pearly; color, white; transparent to translucent. Composition: Fluorine, 52.2; aluminium, 15.0; calcium, 15.4; sodium, 7.6; water, 9.8=100, which is equivalent to the hitherto accepted formula, $2(\text{CaNa})\text{F} + \text{Al}_2\text{F}_3 + 2\text{H}_2\text{O}$; but Braundl has shown that the formula should be written $[\text{NaCa}]\text{F}_3 + \text{Al}_2\text{F}_6 + \text{H}_2\text{O}$.

Thöm-sō'-nī-ān (Th as T), a. & s. [THOMSONIANISM.]

A. As adjective:

Med.: Of or belonging to the medical system called Thomsonianism (q. v.).

B. As subst.: An adherent of Thomsonianism.

Thöm-sō'-nī-ān-ism (Th as T), subst. [Eng. Thomsonian; -ism.] (See def.)

Medicine: A system of medicine founded by Dr. Samuel Thomson, of Massachusetts. The human body is assumed to consist of the four so-called elements—fire, air, earth, and water. Metals and minerals, being ponderous and tending earthward, are supposed to drag down to the earth those who use them as medicines, while vegetables, springing from the ground and tending upward, are fitted to make those who employ them as remedies move upward to life and health.

thöm'-sōn-ite (th as t), s. [After R. D. Thomson; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A member of the group of Zeolites. Crystallization, orthorhombic, occurring as individual crystals but more often in radiated groups, also compact. Hardness, 5-5.5; specific gravity, 2.3-2.4; luster, vitreous to pearly; color when pure, snow-white; brittle; pyroelectric. Composition: Silica, 38.9; alumina, 31.6; lime, 12.9; soda, 4.8; water, 13.8=100. Formula $2\text{SiO}_2\text{Al}_2\text{O}_3(\frac{1}{2}\text{CaO} + \frac{1}{4}\text{NaO})2\frac{1}{2}\text{H}_2\text{O}$. Prof. James D. Dana divides as follows: 1. Ordinary: (1) in regular crystals; (2) in slender prisms, sometimes radiated; (3) radiated fibrous; (4) spherical aggregations of radiated fibers or crystals; (5) massive; 2. Mesole: including scoulerite; 3. Chalilite. Occurs in cavities in old amygdaloidal lavas, and sometimes in so-called metamorphic rocks.

thōng, thwang, thwague, thwong, subst. [A.S. thwang; cogn. with Icel. thvengr = a thong, a shoe-latchet. From the same root as TWINGE (q. v.).] A leather strip or lash; a strap of leather used for fastening anything.

"At the seams, where the different skins are sewed together, they are commonly ornamented with tassels or fringes of narrow thongs, cut out of the same skins."—Cook: Third Voyage, bk. iv. ch. v.

thong-drill, s. A drill to which rotatory motion in alternate directions is communicated by means of a cord. It is mentioned in Homer (Odys. ix. 384).

"Among the Aleutian islanders the thong-drill, and among the New Zealanders a modification of it, is used for boring holes in stone."—Evans: Ancient Stone Implements, p. 44.

†thong-seal, s.

Zoöl.: A name sometimes given to Phoca barbata, from the fact that the Greenlanders cut the hide circularly into a long strip, which they use for harpoon lines.

thōng, v. t. or i. [THONG, s.] To beat with a thong; to lash.

thō'-ōid, a. & s. [Mod. Lat. tho(us); Eng. suff. -oid.]

A. As adj.: A term applied by Huxley to a division of Canidae, containing the Lupine or wolf-like forms, as Canide lupus, C. aureus, C. azaræ, &c. He applied the term Alopecoid to the other division, containing C. argentatus, C. vulpes, &c. (Proc. Zool. Soc., 1880, pp. 283-88.)

"I am disposed . . . to regard Otocyon, and the Thoid and Alopecoid series respectively, as genera, retaining for the two latter the old names of Canis and Vulpes."—Proc. Zool. Soc., 1880, p. 286.

B. As subst.: Any individual of the Thoid series of the family Canidae.

"There is no question that Thoids and Alopecoids similar to those which exist at present inhabited Europe during the Quaternary epoch."—Proc. Zool. Soc., 1880, p. 278.

thoôm, s. [THUMB.] (Scotch.)

Thor, s. [Icel. Thórr, contr. from Thonor; A.S. thunor = thunder.] [THUNDER, THURSDAY.]

Scand. Mythol.: The god of thunder, the second principal god of the ancient Scandinavians. He was the son of Odin or the supreme being, and Jörth = the Earth. He is represented as a powerful man in the prime of life, with a long red beard, a crown on his head, a scepter in one hand, and his hammer in the other. Thursday received its name from him, and his name also enters into many proper names, as Thorsby in Cumberland, England, Jorthorwald in Dumfriesshire, Scotland, &c. His wife was Sif (Love), and his palace Thrudvangr, where he received the warriors who had fallen in battle. He was the champion of the gods, and was called in to their assistance whenever they were in straits. He was also the friend of mankind, and the slayer of trolls and evil spirits. His belt, called Megingjard, had the property of doubling his strength whenever he put it on. His hammer or mace was called Mjöltnir.

Thor's hammers, s. pl.

Anthrop.: A popular name in the north of Europe for celts.

"In Scandinavia and Northern Germany perforated axes and ax-hammers are frequently known as Thor's hammers."—Evans: Ancient Stone Implements, p. 164.

thör'-ā, s. [Etym. doubtful.]

Bot.: Ranunculus thora; a species from the Alps. The roots are very acrid and poisonous, and their juice was formerly used by the Swiss hunters to poison their arrows.

thō-răç'-ic, thō-răç'-ick, a. & s. [Lat. thorax (genit. thoracis) = the chest.]

A. As adj.: Of or pertaining to the thorax or chest; as, thoracic arteries.

B. As substantive:

Anat.: A thoracic artery.

thoracic-duct, s.

Anat.: A long narrow vessel in front of the vertebræ, and opening into the veins on the left side of the neck at the angle of union of the subclavian and anterior jugular. It is the chief trunk of the lymphatic system, and the principal canal through which the chyle and lymph are conveyed to the blood.

thoracic-fins, s. pl.

Ichthy.: A term applied to the ventral fins, when they are situated behind the pectorals.

thoracic-myalgia, s.

Pathol.: A hot wearying pain in the tendinous insertions of the fleshy bodies of the pectoral and sometimes of the intercostal muscles, arising from overwork. Rest, a flannel bandage round the thorax, friction with anodyne liniments, and attention to the general health are the appropriate remedies.

thoracic-regions, s. pl.

Anat.: Fourteen regions into which the thorax in man is divided by imaginary straight lines, longitudinal and transverse, so that the exact situation of any spot may be described. [ABDOMINAL.]

thō-răç'-ī-ca, s. pl. [Mod. Lat., from Lat. thorax (q. v.).]

Zoöl.: An order of Cirripedia. Carapace either a capitulum or a pedicel, or an operculated shell with a basis. Body formed of six thoracic segments, generally furnished with six pairs of limbs; abdomen rudimentary, but often bearing caudal appendages. Families: Balanidae, Verrucidae, and Lepadidae.

thō-răç'-ī-çī, s. pl. [Mod. Latin, from thorax (q. v.).]

Ichthy.: A Linnæan group of Fishes (Systema, ed. 12th), having the ventral fins inserted on the abdominal surface below the pectorals.

thör'-ă-çip'-ô-da, s. pl. [Latin thorax (genit. thoracis), and Gr. pous (genit. podos) = a foot.]

Zoöl.: A division of Crustacea, having the special locomotory organs belonging to the thorax. It contains two legions, Podophthalmia and Edriophthalmia (q. v.).

thör'-ă-cō, pref. [Gr. thōrax (genit. thōrakos) = a breastplate.] Of, or belonging to, or in any way connected with, the thorax.

thör'-ă-cōç'-ēr-ās, s. [Pref. thoraco-, and Gr. keras = a horn.]

Palæontol.: A genus of Orthoceratidae. Shell straight, elongated, conical, with a small, lateral, straight siphuncle. Known species twenty; from the Silurian to the Carboniferous of the United States and Europe.

thör'-ă-cō-sâu'-rūs, s. [Pref. thoraco-, and Gr. sauros = a lizard.]

Palæontol.: A genus of Huxley's Eusuchia, peculiar to the Chalk of North America. They belong to the Procolia of Owen.

thör'-āh (th as t), s. [TORAH.]

thör'-al, a. [Lat. thorus, torus = a couch, a bed.]

1. Of or pertaining to a bed.

"The punishment of adultery . . . was sometimes made by a thoral separation."—Ayliffe: Parergon.

2. Appellative of a line in the hand; called also the Mark of Venus.

thör'-ăx, s. [Lat., from Gr. thōrax = the chest, a breastplate.]

1. Anatomy:

(1) Human: The breast, and specially the bones inclosing it. It is somewhat conical, with convex walls. Its upper opening is contracted, and bounded by the first dorsal vertebra, the first pair of ribs, and the manubrium of the sternum. Its inferior margin slopes downward on each side to the twelfth rib; its longitudinal axis is directed upward and somewhat backward; its transverse diameter at the widest part greatly exceeds the distance from the breast to the back. It consists of the dorsal vertebræ, the sternum, the ribs, and the costal cartilages, and contains the lungs, the heart, &c. The muscles of the thorax are: The intercostals, the levator costarum, the subcostals, the triangularis sterni, with which may be included the diaphragm.

(2) Compar.: The part of the trunk above or anterior to the diaphragm.

2. Entom.: The central division of the body of insects. It is formed of three consolidated somites or segments; the prothorax, the mesothorax, and the metathorax.

*3. Old Armor: A breastplate, cuirass, or corslet; more especially the cuirass or corselet worn by the ancient Greeks, corresponding to the lorica of the Romans. It consisted of a breast and a backpiece fastened by buckles, and was often richly ornamented.

Greek Warrior, wearing Thorax.

thör'-ic'-tī-dæ, s. pl. [Gr. thōrēktēs = armed with a breast-plate.]

Entom.: A family of Necrophaga. Minute, broad, convex beetles, with the prothorax very large; antennæ clavate, eleven-jointed; tarsi five-jointed. Known species twenty, all from the borders of the Mediterranean.

thō-rī'-nā, s. [THORINUM.]

Chem.: ThO. Thorium oxide; thorinic oxide. Prepared from thorite by reducing it to a fine powder and decomposing with hydrochloric acid. After separation of various metallic oxides, it is treated with potassic sulphate and precipitated as potassio-thorinic sulphate. From the solution of the salt in hot water, ammonia throws down thorinic hydrate, which on ignition yields thorina. It is a white powder of a specific gravity = 9.402. The ignited oxide is insoluble in hydrochloric and nitric acids, and only difficultly soluble in sulphuric acid.

thō-rīn'-ic, a. [Eng. thorin(um); -ic.] Pertaining to thorium.

thorinic-oxide, s. [THORINA.]

thō-rī'-nūm, s. [Latinized from Thor (q. v.).]

Chem.: Thorium. Atomic weight = 115.7; symbol Th. A divalent metallic element belonging to the group of earth-metals discovered by Berzelius, in 1828, in thorite. It is a very rare element, and is obtained by heating the anhydrous chloride with potassium. The reduced thorium is a gray metallic powder, having a specific gravity of 7.65-7.79. When heated, it burns with a bright flame, producing snow-white thorina without any trace of fusion. It is not oxidized by either hot or cold water, dissolves slowly in nitric and sulphuric acids, more easily in hydrochloric acid, and is not attacked by caustic alkalis.

thorium-chloride, s.

Chem.: ThCl₂. Prepared by heating an intimate mixture of thorina and charcoal in a stream of dry chlorine gas. It is deposited on the cool part of the tube in white, shining crystals, which are rectangular, four-sided tables. They deliquesce in the air, and dissolve in water with rise of temperature.

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camel, hēr, thēre; pine, pīt, sire, sīr, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rūle, fūll; trȳ, Sȳrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

thorium-hydrate, s.

Chem.: Th(HO)₂. Obtained as a gelatinous mass by the action of caustic alkalis on solutions of thorium salts. Under the air pump it dries up into a white powder, readily soluble in all acids, excepting oxalic, molybdic, and hydrofluoric acids.

thorium-oxide, s. [THORINA.]thorium-sulphide, s.

Chem.: ThS. Thorium burns in the vapor of sulphur, forming a yellow pulverulent sulphide, which acquires metallic luster by pressure. It is very slowly attacked by acids, and is converted into thorina by roasting.

thör'-ite, s. [Eng. thor(ium); suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: An isometric mineral with a tetrahedral habit; occurring in crystals and massive in syenite, near Brevig, Norway. Also found as pseudomorphs in the form of zircon and orthoclase. Hardness, 4.5-5; specific gravity, 4.3-5.4; luster, vitreous to resinous; color, orange to brownish-yellow, black; streak, light-orange to dark-brown. Composition: Essentially a silicate of thoria; silica, 17.0; thoria, 76.2; water, 6.8=100, which is equivalent to the formula ThO₂SiO₂+1½HO.

2. A high explosive invented by Dr. H. P. Tuttle, of Tacoma, Washington. Its chief value consists in its ability to pass through armor plate without exploding, except by action of the time-fuse, and its non-liability to accidental explosion. Its formula is known only to its inventor.

thór'-i-üm, s. [THORINUM.]

thorn, *thorne, s. [A. S. thorn; cogn. with Dut. doorn; Icel. thorn; Dan. tjörn; Sw. törne; Ger. dorn; Goth. thaurnus.]

I. Ordinary Language:1. Literally:

(1) Any sharp-pointed projection likely to lacerate the hand, on the stem or any other part of the shrub, tree, or herb. Popularly, it includes both a botanical thorn and a prickle.

(2) A thorny shrub, tree, or herb; often used in this sense in composition, as the Blackthorn, the Hawthorn, &c. When the word thorn is used alone, it generally signifies a hawthorn. In Scripture, and specially in the Old Testament, thorn is a generic word including various spinous plants belonging to different families. Precision in identifying them all is impossible.

2. Figuratively:

(1) Anything that pricks or annoys as a thorn; anything painful, irritating, or troublesome; a source of annoyance or trouble; an obstacle, a trouble, a care.

(2) The same as THORN-LETTER (q. v.).

II. Bot.: A sharp conical projection constituting the growing point of a branch which has proved abortive. That this is its origin is shown by the fact that sometimes trees, which are thorny in their wild state, have their spines converted into branches when long cultivated in a garden, as is the case with the apple and the pear. A thorn differs from a prickle, which is so superficial that it comes away when the bark is peeled off, while in similar circumstances a thorn, being deep seated, remains. Sometimes thorns bear leaves, as in the Whitethorn.

thorn-apple, s.

Bot.: Datura stramonium.

thorn-bush, s. A shrub that bears thorns.

"The lantern is the moon; I, the man in the moon; this thorn-bush, my thorn-bush; and this dog, my dog."—Shakesp.: Midsummer Night's Dream, v. i.

thorn'-bäck, s. [Eng. thorn, s., and back.]

Ichthy.: Raja clavata, one of the commonest of the North Atlantic Rays. It is dark-brown in color, with lighter spots; the whole upper surface is covered with asperities, and a variable number of large spines, like recurved nails, more abundant in the female than in the male, but always extending down the tail in the median line. It is in the best condition in November, but is not highly esteemed as a food-fish.

thorn'-lëss, adj. [Eng. thorn, s.; -less.] Free from thorns. (Lit. & fig.)

"Youth's gay prime and thornless paths."
Coleridge: Sonnet to Bowles.

thorn'-tail, s. [Eng. thorn, s., and tail.]

Ornith.: A popular name for the species of two genera of Humming-birds—Gouldia (four species) and Discura (one). The tail-feathers in the first genus are much elongated and sharply pointed, and the tarsi are covered with a tuft of feathers. Discura has a racket at the end of the tail.

thorn'-y, *thorn-ie, a. [Eng. thorn, s.; -y.]

I. Lit.: Full of thorns or spines; rough with thorns or prickles.

"He in the thick woven covert Painfully tugs, or in the thorny brake Torn and embarrass'd bleeds."
Somerville: Chase, i.

thorough-lighted, a. Lighted so that the light passes right through. Applied to a room or building that has windows on opposite sides, the light not being intercepted by partitions.

thorough-paced, a. Perfectly trained to go through all the paces of a well-trained horse; hence, perfect or complete; thorough; thorough-going; going all lengths.

"For he [Gregory of Huntington] was thorough-paced in three tongues, Latine, Greek [as appears by his many comments on those grammarians], and Hebrew."—Fuller: Worthies; Huntingdonshire.

thorough-pin, subst. A disease in horses, which consists of enlarged mucous capsules on each side of the hocks, giving somewhat the appearance as if a pin had been thrust through.

"When the joint capsule becomes distended with fluid, it not only protrudes in front of the hock, filling up the hollow which is characteristic of the healthy joint, but it also exhibits itself in the form of a soft swelling at the upper part of the joint, in the space within the bone which forms the point of the hock and the bone of the leg directly in front of it. This swelling appears on both sides of the leg, and from its position is called a thorough-pin. Thorough-pins of the limited form, consisting of small bursal tumors in the space in front of the bone which forms the point of the hock, quite unconnected with the principal joint surface, are of no more consequence than ordinary windgalls. Thorough-pins are only serious when they are a part of the disease of the principal capsule, forming, in fact, a portion of a 'blood' or 'bog' spavin."—Field, April 4, 1885.

thorough-spel, a. Fully accomplished; thoroughly-paced.

"Our thorough-spel republic of Whigs, which contains the bulk of all hoppers, pretenders, and professors, are most highly useful to princes."—Swift.

wrinkled, pale underneath and hairy; the involucre cylindrical and imbricated; the twelve to fifteen florets tubular. It grows in bogs in North America. The whole plant is intensely bitter. A decoction of the leaves has been given as a febrifuge. In larger quantities it is emetic, sudorific, and aperient. Called also Boneset and Crosswort.

thor-ow, a., &c. [THOROUGH.]

thorp, thorpe, s. [A. S. thorp=a village; cogn. with Dut. dorp=a village; Icel. thorp; Dan. torp; Sw. torp=a little farm, a cottage; Goth. thaurp; Ger. dorf.] A group of houses standing together in the country; a village, a hamlet. It occurs principally as an element in place names, and in names derived from places; as, Althorp, Copsmans-thorpe, &c.

"Wish'd for, or welcome, wheresoe'er he came—Among the tenantry of thorpe and vill."
Wordsworth: Excursion, bk. viii.

thōs, s. [THOUS.]

thōse, *thos, *thas, a. & pron. [THIS.] Used as the plural of that, these being used as the plural of this, but etymologically one of the forms of the plural of this. When those and these are used to express contradistinction, those refers to the things first mentioned, or furthest off; these to things last mentioned, or nearer.

thōu (in the objective and dative cases thee, pl. you or ye), pron. [A. S. dhū; cogn. with Icel. thú; Goth. thu; Dan., Sw., & Ger. du; Irish & Gael. tu; Wel. ti; Russ. tui; Latin tu; Gr. su, tu; Pers. tú; Sanscrit tvam. The A. S. dhū was thus declined: nom. dhū, genit. dhīn, dat. dhe, accus. dhec, dhe; nom. pl. ge, genit. eower, dat. eow, accus. eowic, eow. In the seventeenth century the employment of thou to any one indicated familiarity with him, whether of love or of contempt. The use of the plural you for the singular thou was established as early as the beginning of the fourteenth century.] The second personal pronoun of the singular number; used to denote the person spoken to; thyself.

"When pain and anguish wring the brow,
A ministering angel thou."

Scott: Marmion, vi. 30.

¶ (1) It was frequently used emphatically in phrases expressive of contempt, reproach, scorn, anger, or the like.

"All that Lord Cobham did was at thy instigation, thou viper, for I thou thee, thou traitor."—Coke: To Sir Walter Raleigh, at his Trial of the latter."

(2) The employment of thou by the early Quakers implied that they regarded no man, however exalted his rank, with special reverence. With reference to them Fuller, in the dedication of his Seventh Book, explains the usage of his time in a sentence useful for lexicographical purposes:

"In opposition whereunto we maintain that thou from superiors to inferiors is proper as a sign of command; from equals to equals is passable as a note of familiarity; but from inferiors to superiors, if proceeding from ignorance, hath a smack of clownishness; if from affectation, a tone of contempt."

(3) Thou is used now, except by Quakers, only in addresses to the Deity, and in poetry.

thōu, v. t. & i. [THOU, pron.]

A. Trans.: To address with the pronoun thou; to treat with familiarity.

"Taunt him with the licence of ink; if thou thou'st him some thrice, it shall not be amiss."—Shakesp.: Twelfth Night, iii. 2.

B. Intrans.: To use the words thou and thee in conversation.

thōugh (gh silent), *thogh, *thoughe, *thah, *thaih, *theah, *thæh, *thegh, *thagh, *thau, *thauh, *thei, *theigh, conj. & adv. [A. S. dheáh, dhéh; cogn. with Dut. doch=yet, but; Icel. thó; Dan. dog; Sw. dock; O. H. Ger. doh Ger. doch; Goth. thauh.]

A. As conj.: Granting, admitting, allowing, or assuming it to be the fact that; even were it the case that; even if; notwithstanding that.

"Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him."—Job xiii. 15.

B. As adv.: Notwithstanding this or that; however, for all that.

"Let me entreat you To use her name as little as you can, though."
Beaum. & Flet.: Sea Voyage, iv.

¶ (1) As though: As if.

"In the vine were three branches, and it was as though it budded."—Genesis xl. 10.

(2) Though that: Though.

"Though that nature with a beauteous wall Doth oft close in pollution."
Shakesp.: Twelfth Night, i. 2.

(3) What though: Elliptically used for What care I though, What does it signify though, &c.

"By chance but not by truth: what though?"
Shakesp.: King John, i. thought (ough as â), *thoughte, pret. & pa. par. of v [THINK.] thought (ough as â), *thoght, s. [A. S. thohht, gethoht, theht, getheht, from gethoht, thohht, pa. par. of thecan=to think (q. v.); Icel. thótti, thóttir, from thátti, pa. t. of thekkja=to know; Ger. dachte, gedacht, from gedacht, pa. par. of denken=to think.]

1. The act of thinking; the exercise of the mind in any way except sense and perception.

"Thought is free."—Shakesp.: Tempest, iii. 2.

2. Serious consideration; deliberation, reflection.

"Evil is wrought
By want of thought
As well as want of heart."

Hood: Lady's Dream.

*3. Anxious, brooding care; deep concern or solicitude.

"Take no thought for your life, what ye shall eat, or what ye shall drink."—Matthew vi. 25.

4. The mental state of one who thinks; silent contemplation; deep cogitation; meditation or study.

"She pined in thought."

Shakesp.: Twelfth Night, ii. 4.

5. The power or faculty of thinking; the mental faculty; the mind.

"It is past the infinite of thought."

Shakesp.: Much Ado, ii. 3.

6. That which is thought; an idea; a conception of the mind; as:

(1) A judgment, an opinion, a conclusion.

"I speak my thoughts."—Shakesp.: Much Ado, i. 1.

(2) That which springs from, originates in, or is produced by the imagination; a creation of the mind having a distinct existence from the mind that created it; a fancy, a conceit, a conception.

"To me the meanest flower that blows can give Thoughts that do often lie too deep for tears."

Wordsworth: Intim. of Immortality, xi.

*7. Hope, expectation.

"We have now no thought in us but France."

Shakesp.: Henry V., i. 2.

8. Intention, design.

"All their thoughts are against me for evil."—Psalm lvi. 5.

¶ (1) A thought: A very small degree or quantity.

"If the hair were a thought browner."

Shakesp.: Much Ado, iii. 4.

(2) Second thoughts: Maturer deliberation; after consideration.

"Is it so true that second thoughts are best?"

Tennyson: Sea Dreams, 65.

thought-reader, s. A mesmerist who claims to be able to discover what is passing in another person's mind; an exponent of thought-reading.

"The thought-reader will no doubt find some curious and subtle suggestion of some unknown force."—Saturday Review, June 3, 1882, p. 698.

thought-reading, s. A branch of mesmerism. While exhibiting their powers its exponents are blindfolded, and claim that without collusion or the aid of confederates they can find articles hidden in their absence, give the numbers of bank-notes, &c. In thought-reading proper the thought-reader holds the hand and pulse of the person to be operated on, and professes to be able, by mesmeric sympathy, to discover what is passing in his mind.

"The self-elected investigators of thought-reading."—Saturday Review, June 3, 1882, p. 698.

thought-transference, s. The action of one mind upon another without communication through the senses; mental suggestion (q. v.).

thought-éd (ough as â), a. [Eng. thought, s.; -ed.] Having thoughts; chiefly in composition; as, sad-thoughted.

thought-en, pret. of v. [THINK.]

thought-en, a. [Eng. thought, s.; -en.] Having a thought; thinking.

"Be you thoughten

That I came with no ill intent."
Shakesp.: Pericles, iv. 6.

thought-fûl (ough as â), a. [Eng. thought; -ful(l).]

1. Full of thought or reflection; contemplative; engaged in or given to meditation.

2. Attentive, careful; having the mind directed to an object.

"It requires much care, and nice observation to extract and separate the precious ore from so much vile mixture; so that the understanding must be patient and wary, and thoughtful in seeking truth."—Glanvill: Essay 1.

*3. Promoting meditation; favorable to meditation or contemplation.

"War, horrid war, your thoughtful walks invade,
And steel now glitters in the muses' shade."

Pope: Chorus of Athenians.

*4. Anxious, solicitous; full of anxiety or care.

5. Exhibiting or evincing thought or care; considerate; as, a thoughtful act or gift.

¶ Thoughtful, or full of thinking; considerate, or ready to consider; and deliberate, ready to deliberate, rise upon each other in their signification: he who is thoughtful does not forget his duty; he who is considerate pauses, and considers properly what is his duty; he who deliberates considers deliberately. It is a recommendation to a subordinate person to be thoughtful in doing what is wished of him; it is the recommendation of a confidential person to be considerate, as he has often to judge according to his own discretion; it is the recommendation of a person who is acting for himself in critical matters to be deliberate. There is this farther distinction in the word deliberate, that it may be used in the bad sense to mark a settled intention to do evil; young people may sometimes plead, in extenuation of their guilt, that their misdeeds do not arise from deliberate malice.

thought-fûl-lý (ough as â), adv. [English thoughtful; -ly.] In a thoughtful or contemplative manner; with thought or consideration; with solicitude or anxiety.

"The Planter, under his roof of thatch, Smoked thoughtfully and slow."

*thōū'-ṣand-föld, thu-sen-fald, a. [Eng. thousand; -fold.] Multiplied a thousand times.

thōū'-ṣandth (s as z), a. & s. [Eng. thousand; -th.]

A. As adjective:

1. Next after the nine hundred and ninety-ninth; the ordinal of a thousand.

"He that will divide a minute into a thousand parts, and break but a part of a thousandth part in the affairs of love, it may be said of him that Cupid hath clapt him o' th' shoulder, but I'll warrant him heart-whole."—Shakesp.: As You Like It, iv. 1.

2. Constituting or being one of a thousand equal parts into which anything is or may be divided.

3. Hence, fig., occurring or being one of a very great number; as, to do a thing for the thousandth time.

B. As subst.: The thousandth part of anything; one of a thousand parts into which anything is or may be divided.

2. Zoöl.: [ALOPHAS, FOX-SHARK.]

thrāsh'-īng, thrēsh'-īng, pr. par., adj. & subst. [THRASH.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As substantive:

1. Lit.: The operation by which grain is separated from the straw. It is performed in various ways, by beating with a flail or thrashing machine, or by tramping with the feet of oxen, &c. This last mode was that employed by the nations of antiquity, and is the one still practiced in the south of Europe, Persia, India, &c. Oxen were generally employed for this purpose, and sometimes dragged a kind of roller, studded with iron knobs, over the sheaves, which were spread in the form of a circle on the floor, the grain being placed toward the center. Thrashing by flails is still practiced in some parts, but the introduction of thrashing-machines has caused that system to be but little followed, on account of the greater time and labor involved in it, as compared with the machines. Thrashing in Lombardy is generally performed by means of a fluted roller drawn around in a circular track.

"The good red bearded wheat Far, commeth hardly out of the huske, and asketh some painful thrashing."—P. Holland: Pliny, bk. xviii., ch. xxx.

2. Fig.: A sound flogging or drubbing.

thrashing-floor, s. A floor or area on which grain is thrashed or beaten out. In eastern countries, from the earliest times, thrashing-floors were in the open air, but in colder and moister climates, such floors are necessarily under cover, as in a barn.

"O God, what was the thrashing-floor of a Jebusite to thee, above all other soils?"—Bp. Hall: Contemp.; Num-bering of the People.

thrashing-machine, thrashing-mill, subst. A machine for thrashing or beating out grain, as wheat, oats, barley, &c., from the straw. The motive power may be that of horses, oxen, water, wind, or steam. Menzies made a machine in Scotland in 1732, and Stirling of Dumblane another in 1758, but they do not seem to have been successes. Meikle, of Tynningham, East Lothian, invented a machine in 1786, which is the type of modern thrashers. Menzies' had a series of revolving flails, and Stirling's had a cylinder with arms upon a vertical shaft running at high velocity. Meikle invented the drum with beaters acting upon the grain in the sheaf, which was fed between rollers. The English improvement was to make the beating drum work in a concave known as the breasting, the grain and straw being scutched and rubbed between the two and carried to the shaker, which removed the straw from the grain and chaff, a large amount of grain also falling through the bars of the concave. Both American and English thrashing-machines are driven by engines of from four to six horse-power. The feeding-rollers are three and a-half inches in diameter, and make thirty-five revolutions per minute. The straw-rakes have the same diameter, and make thirty revolutions per minute. The drum has beaters formed by slats on the ends of radial arms, differing in that respect from the American thrashing-machines, which usually have skeleton-cylinders armed with radial teeth. The shcaf, in America, after cutting the band, is spread upon the inclined feed-chute by the person who is feeding, and passed gradually into the throat of the machine, head ends first. In some of the English machines the straw is fed in broad-side on, to prevent the breaking of the straw; by this means, only a part of each beater acts upon the ears. In the American machine an inclined chute furnishes the sheaf, heads foremost, to the action of the radial teeth that are attached to the skeleton-cylinder, and are opposed to the teeth in the concave plates beneath. A straw-carrier elevates and discharges the straw, shaking out the grain, which falls into the well. A lifting-screw elevates and forwards the grain and chaff from the well to the vibrating shoe that carries the dividing screen, with the aid of the blast from the fan in its rear, separates the grain from its accompanying refuse. The clean grain then falls into a forwarding screw that discharges through a spout into a measure or bag. An elevator returns the tailings and unthrashed heads to the cylinder to be worked over. An endless belt furnished with transverse slats, and sometimes covered with an apron, takes the straw from the machine. Some machines are also provided with a straw carrier that elevates and forwards the straw, commonly discharging it on the stack. In some of the later American machines the tops of the grain are cut off close to the heads and thrashed without passing the straw through the machine, and thus the haulmes are not broken, rendering the straw much more valuable for the manufacture of hats, &c. Still other improvements have been made, adding much to the availability and compactness of these valuable adjuncts to farm equipment.

thrāw'-in, thrāwn, a. [THRAW, v.] Distorted; having the appearance of ill-humor; cross-grained, perverse.

threåd, thred, threde, threed, thrid, subst. [A. S. thred = that which is twisted, a thread, from thráwan = to twist, to throw (q. v.); cogn. with Dut. draad, from draaijen = to twist; Icel. thráðr; Dan. tråd; Sw. tråd; Ger. draht, draht = wire, thread, from O. H. Ger. drájan; Ger. drehen = to twist.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Literally:

(1) A compound cord consisting of two or more single yarns, doubled and twisted. In the trade it is divided into lace, stocking, and sewing thread. The doubling and twisting of thread is effected by spindles and flyers operating in a manner similar to the throstle (q. v.). The twist is usually in a direction the reverse of that given to the individual yarns. In a general sense thread denotes the filaments of some fibrous substance, such as cotton, flax, silk, or wool, spun out to considerable length, the common name of such filaments being yarn. Thread is principally used for sewing.

(2) A yarn measure, containing in cotton yarn fifty-four inches, in linen yarn ninety inches, and in worsted yarn thirty-five inches. (Simmonds.)

2. Figuratively:

(1) A fine filament or thread-like body of any kind, as the filament of a flower, or of any fibrous substance, as of bark; a fine filament or line of gold or silver, a filament of melted glass, the line spun by a spider, &c.

"The smallest thread That ever spider twisted from her womb."

Shakesp.: King John, iv. 3.

(2) Used as an emblem of life, as being spun and cut by the Fates.

"Let not Bardolph's vital thread be cut."

Shakesp.: Henry V., iii. 6.

(3) Something continued in a long course or tenor.

"There is here a work of fiction praiseworthy as such, and never flagging in the thread of its excitement from beginning to end."—London Daily Telegraph.

* (4) Distinguishing property; quality, fineness.

"A neat courtier, of a most elegant thread."

Ben Jonson.

(5) The central line of a stream or watercourse (Bouvier.)

II. Technically:

1. Bot.: A long delicate hair.

2. Mach.: The spiral projecting rib on the shaft of a screw.

3. Mining: A slight vein of ore, smaller than a branch, passing off from the main vein into the rock.

¶ (1) Air threads: The fine white filaments which are seen floating in the air in summer, the production of spiders; gossamer.

* (2) Thread and thrum: The good and bad together; an expression borrowed from weaving, the thread being the substance of the warp, and the thrum the end of the warp by which it is fastened to the loom.

"O Fates, come, come, Cut thread and thrum."

Shakesp.: Midsummer Night's Dream, v.

thread-carrier, s.

Knitting-mach.: The hook or eyelet on the carriage through which the yarn passes.

thread-cells, s. pl.

Zoöl.: Thread-like stinging processes found in the Hydrozoa.

thread-finisher, s. A machine in which thread is treated to give it a smooth and polished surface.

thread-frame, s. The doubling and twisting-mill by which two or more yarns are combined to form a thread. The yarns as they are unwound from the bobbins or cops are passed beneath the surface of a solution of gum or starch in a trough; the wetting enables them to be condensed into a more solid thread; they then pass between rollers, by which they are laid parallel, or nearly so, and are thence conducted to a flyer, by which they are twisted together, and to the bobbin, on which they are wound.

thread-gauge, s. A gauge for determining the number of threads to the inch on screws and taps.

thread-guide, s.

Sewing-mach.: A loop, eye, or other contrivance, forming a guide for the thread when it changes its direction at points between the reel and needle-eye.

thread-lace, s. Lace of linen thread; such as Honiton, and many other kinds.

thread-molds, s. pl.

Bot.: The Fungi of the group Hyphomycetes.

thread-needle, s. A game in which children stand in a row holding hands, and the outer one still holding the hand of the next runs between the others. Also called Thread-the-needle.

thread-paper, s. Thin strips of paper for wrapping up skeins of thread.

thread-plants, s. pl.

Comm.: Plants whose fibers may be manufactured into thread, as flax, cotton, &c.

thread-waxer, s. A bowl of heated shoemaker's wax, through which the thread is conducted in sewing-machines for boots, shoes, and leather.

threåd, v. t. [THREAD, s.]

1. Lit.: To pass a thread through the eye or aperture of.

"The largest crooked needle, with a ligature of the size of that I have threaded it with, in taking up the spermatic vessels."—Sharp: Surgery.

2. Fig.: To pass or pierce through, as through something narrow, interwoven, or intricate.

"A serf that rose betimes to thread the wood,

And hew the bough that bought his children's food."

Byron: Lara, ii. 24.

threåd'-bäre, thred-bare, thrid-bare, adj. [Eng. thread, s., and bare.]

1. Lit.: Worn so that the component threads can be traced; worn to the naked thread; having the nap worn off.

"A poor needy fellow in a threadbare cloak."—Camden: Hist. Queen Elizabeth (an. 1515).

2. Fig.: Worn out; trite, hackneyed; used so long that the novelty has worn off.

"Many writers of moral discourses run into stale topics and threadbare quotations, not handling their subjects fully and closely."—Swift.

threåd'-bäre-nëss, s. [Eng. threadbare; -ness.] The quality or state of being threadbare; triteness; poverty.

"There was much significance in his look with regard to the coat; it spoke of the sleekness of folly and the threadbareness of wisdom."—Mackenzie: Man of Feeling, ch. xxi.

threåd'-en, thread-den, a. [English thread; -en.] Made of thread.

"Some in her threaden fillet still did bide,

And true to bondage would not break from thence."

Shakesp.: Complaint of a Lover, 33.

threåd'-ër, s. [Eng. thread, v.; -er.] One who or that which threads; specif., a device for guiding the thread into the eye of a needle.

†threåd'-i-nëss, s. [Eng. thready; -ness.] The state of being thread-like, or drawn out into threads. (Goodrich.) threåd'-like, adj. [Eng. thread, and like.] Resembling a thread; long and fine.

threåd'-shāped, a. [Eng. thread, and shaped.]

Bot.: Slender, like a thread, as the filaments of most plants and the styles of many.

threåd'-wōrm, s. [Eng. thread, and worm.]

Zoöl.: A popular name for any species of the Nematodea (q. v.), from their long, filiform body. By some authorities the name is restricted to Oxyurus vermicularis, the Small Threadworm, which infests man. [OXYURUS, TRICHOCEPHALUS.]

threåd'-ŷ, thred-die, a. [Eng. thread; -y.]

1. Like thread or filament; filamentous, fibrous.

"Branches, like the small and threddie roots of a tree."—Granger: Comment. on Ecclesiastes, p. 325.

2. Containing or carrying thread; covered with thread.

"From hand to hand

The thready shuttle glides along the lines."

Dyer: Fleece, iii.

threāp, threēp, threpe, v. t. & i. [A. S. threāp-ian = to threap, to reprove, to afflict; Icel. threfa = to wrangle, to dispute.]

A. Transitive:

1. To assert with pertinacity; to persist in asserting in reply to denial. (Scotch.)

*2. To call.

"Sol gold is and luna silver we threpe."

Chaucer: C. T., 16,294.

B. Intransitive:

1. To aver or assert with pertinacity; to maintain by dint of assertion. (Scotch.)

*2. To contend, to quarrel.

*3. To threaten.

"My foes they bray so loud, and eke threapen so fast."

Surrey: Psalm lv.

*4. To cry out; to complain.

"Some crye upon God, some other threpe that he hath forgotten theym."—Bp. Fisher: Sermons.

threāp, s. [THREAP, v.] A vehement or pertinacious affirmation; an obstinate decision or determination. (Scotch.) threāt, thret, subst. [A. S. threāt = (1) a crowd, crush, or throng of people; (2) a great pressure, calamity, trouble, a threat, from threāt, pa. t. of threótan = to press extremely, to urge, to afflict, to vex; cogn. with Icel. thrjóta (pa. t. thraut, pa. par. throtinn) = to fail, to lack; Goth. usthriutan = to trouble, to vex; O. "He had long kept England passive by promising to support the throne against the Parliament."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. ii.

3. One of an order of angels who are usually represented with double wings, supporting the throne of the Almighty in ethereal space.

"The primal godhead, the Trinity in Unity, was alone absolute, ineffable, inconceivable; alone essential purity, light, knowledge, truth, beauty, goodness. These qualities were communicated in larger measure in proportion to their closer approximation to itself, to the three descending triads which formed the celestial hierarchy: I. The seraphim, cherubim, and thrones. II. The dominations, virtues, powers. III. Principalities, archangels, angels. This celestial hierarchy formed, as it were, concentric circles around the unapproachable Trinity. The nearest, and as nearest partaking most fully of the divine essence, was the place of honor. The thrones, seraphim, and cherubim approximated most closely, with nothing intermediate, and were more immediately and eternally conformed to the godhead."—Milman: Hist. of Latin Christianity, bk. xiv., ch. ii.

thrōne, v. t. & i. [THRONE, s.]

The Lith. strazdas, strazda show that an initial s has been lost. The original form appears to have been star-da. The original sense was prob. chirper, or twitterer; cf. Gr. s., trizein, trizein=to twitter; Lat. strix=the screech-owl.]

Ornith.: The book-name for any of the Turdidæ (q. v.). They are universally distributed except in New Zealand, and are very highly organized birds, and it is for this reason, perhaps, as well as on account of their omnivorous diet, that they have been able to establish themselves on a number of remote islands. They differ widely in their habits and in their habitats; some are gregarious, others live solitarily or in pairs. The Wood Thrush (Turdus mustelinus) is abundant in North America in summer, as far north as Hudson's Bay, retiring to tropical and sub-tropical regions in winter. It is rather smaller than the Song Thrush, and very similar to it. Several other species are found in North America. The type-genus Turdus (q. v.) has several European species, but to only three of these is the name Thrush applied. The Song Thrush, Thrush, or Mavis (Turdus musicus), the Missel Thrush (T. viscivorus), and White's Thrush (q. v.) (T. varius). The Song Thrush, generally spoken of without any qualifying adjective, is not quite nine inches long; back and upper surface brown of slightly different shades, chin white, abdomen and tail coverts grayish-white; throat, breast, and flanks, together with the sides of the neck, yellow, thickly spotted with dark-brown. It is one of the best-known European song birds, and in captivity is easily taught simple airs. It is found all over Europe, but leaves some of the northern parts in winter, being thus practically a bird of passage. It feeds on insects, worms, slugs, snails, and in the summer greedily devours cherries and smaller fruit. It usually builds in the center of a thick bush or shrub, but sometimes in an open shed, and lines the interior of the nest with mud, clay, or dung, so as to form a cup. The eggs are four to six in number, bright bluish-green, with brownish spots. The male takes part in the work of incubation, and is very attentive in feeding his mate while she is sitting. They usually produce two broods in the season. [MISSEL-THRUSH.]

thrush-like birds, s. pl. [TURDI-FORMES.]

thrush-nightingale, s.

Ornith.: (See extract).

"In the east of Europe a second species of Nightingale occurs, which, though long known to German bird-fanciers as the Sprosser, was first specifically distinguished

Thūg, Thag, s. [Hind. thaga=to deceive.]

1. Lit. & Hist. (pl.): The name given in the northern provinces of India to a fraternity, who looked upon murder as the sole means of staying the wrath of the goddess Kali, and derived their principal means of support from the plunder of their victims. In old times, according to Hindu mythology, Kali made war upon a race of giants, from every drop of whose blood sprang a demon.

These demons multiplied, and at last the goddess created two men to whom she gave handkerchiefs, with which they strangled the infernal beings. When the men had finished their task, the goddess gave them the privilege of using the handkerchiefs against their fellows, and so the class of Thugs is said to have arisen. Although worshipping a Hindu goddess, the majority of the Thugs were Mohammedans. They usually traveled in gangs, the members of which had ostensibly some honest calling in their own community, and in selecting their victims always endeavored to pitch upon persons of property in order that while propitiating the goddess they might enrich her worshippers. Various steps were taken to suppress the Thugs both by the native and the English governments, and in 1829 Lord William Bentinck adopted such stringent measures that in six years (1830-35) 2,000 of them were arrested; of these 1,500 were convicted and sentenced to death, transportation, or imprisonment, according to the gravity of the charges proved against them. In 1836 a law was passed making the fact of belonging to a gang of Thugs punishment by imprisonment for life with hard labor, and though some gangs probably linger in districts where British authority or the power of the more enlightened native princes cannot reach, the system is now so broken that it is practically powerless.

2. Fig.: A rough; a pugilist.

"It would seem to be a good time for the Governors of the various States to keep the thugs on the run until they are run out of the country. There is no place in this country where such a fight can take place if the State executives do their duty. It would seem to be an admirable opportunity for getting rid not only of the two thugs, but of the terrorism of the whole unsavory gang of brutes, bullies, and gamblers who follow them."—Chicago Tribune, Jan. 4, 1894.

Thūg'-geē, Thā'-gī, s. [Hind. thagi.] The practices of the Thugs; Thuggism.

"They [the Thugs] were colonized at Jubbulpore into a trade settlement, where technical instruction was afforded them and their children, and the practice of Thuggee has become extinct."—Ripley & Dana: American Cyclop., xv. 730.

Thūg'-gīsm, s. [Eng. thug; -ism.] The system of assassination carried on by the Thugs to appease the goddess Kali, and to secure eternal happiness for themselves.

"Out of this fermenting mass of half-crazy ideas rise strange monstrosities and horrible beliefs. Such a one is Thuggism."—Brown: Peoples of the World, iv. 75.

thū-i'-tēs, thū-y'-tēs, thū-yi'-tēs, s. [Mod. Lat. thuja, thuja; suff. -ites.]

Palæontology: A genus of Conifers akin to the recent Thuja.

thū'-ja, thū'-ya, s. [Lat. thya, thyia, from Gr. thua, thuia=an African tree with sweet-smelling wood used in making costly furniture; probably the Arbor vitæ. (See def.)]

Bot.: Arbor vitæ, a genus of Cupressæ; natives of Asia, Africa, and North America. Evergreen trees or shrubs, with monœcious flowers, having the male catkins ovoid and lateral, the female ones solitary and terminal; the former has the pollen of each flower included in four cases attached to the inner face of the scale toward its base; ovary united to the bractea, the two forming a semipeltate receptacle with two ovules; seeds sometimes slightly winged. Leaves scale-like, closely imbricated or compressed. Thuja occidentalis, the Western or American Arbor vitæ, the species common in gardens, has obovate cones, with the interior scales truncate and gibbous beneath the apex. It grows best in cool, swampy places. The wood is fitted for posts and rails, the branches for brooms, which have a certain fragrance. It has attained a height of thirty-five or forty feet, but is generally much smaller. It is well adapted for hedges, bearing cutting well. T. orientalis, the Oriental or Chinese Arbor vitæ, occurring on rocky ridges in Siberia, China, and Japan, has the cones elliptic, with the interior scales blunt and mucronate below the apex. T. pendula, a native of Tartary, has globose cones, and filiform pendulous branches. All the species are stimulating and diuretic.

thuja-oil, s.

Chem.: Obtained by distilling the ends of the branches and leaves of Thuja occidentalis with water. It is a mixture of several essential oils boiling between 190° and 206°. It is colorless when fresh, has the odor of thuja, is lighter than water, slightly soluble therein, but easily soluble in alcohol and ether. By oil of vitriol it is immediately resinized.

thū'-jēne, s. [THUJONE.]

thū'-jēn-in, s. [Eng. thujen(e); -in.]

Chem.: C₂₃H₂₄O₁₄. Thujigenin. Obtained by heating for a short time a mixture of thujetin and hydrochloric acid. It forms microscopic needles slightly soluble in water, but soluble in alcohol.

bōil, bōy; pōut, jōwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, aş; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f
-cian, -tian = şan. -tion. -sion = şhūn; -tion, -şion = zhūn. -tious, -cious, -sious = şhūs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bel, del thū-jēt'-ic, a. [Eng. thujetic(in); -ic.] Derived from or containing thujetin.

thujetic-acid, s.

Chem.: $C_{28}H_{22}O_{13}$. Prepared by boiling thujetin with baryta water, adding sulphuric acid after a while, then alcohol, and filtering the liquid when hot. It separates in lemon-yellow microscopic needles, soluble in alcohol and precipitated by water.

thū-jēt'-in, s. [Eng. thuj(in); -etin.]

Chem.: $C_{28}H_{28}O_{16}$. A tannin-substance obtained along with a crystallizable sugar by heating thujin with dilute acids. The liquid after a time becomes colorless, and deposits thujetin on evaporation. It is soluble in alcohol and ether, and insoluble in water. Its alcoholic solution assumes a splendid blue-green color with ammonia, and is turned inky-black with ferric chloride.

thū-jīg'-en-in, s. [THUJENIN.]

thū-jīn, s. [Mod. Lat. thuj(a); -in.]

Chemistry: $C_{20}H_{22}O_{12}$. A crystallizable glucoside occurring in the green parts of Thuja occidentalis. It forms lemon-yellow microscopic crystals, has an astringent taste, is soluble in alcohol, gives a yellow precipitate with acetate of lead, and is colored dark green with ferric chloride.

thū-jōne, thū-jēne, s. [Mod. Latin thuj(a); -one, -ene.]

Chem.: A volatile hydro-carbon obtained from thuja oil by distilling it over iodine, quicklime, and potassium, in succession. Thujone is like turpentine oil in taste and odor, is lighter than water, and boils at 165-175°.

Thū-lē, subst. [Lat.] The name given by the ancients to the most northern country known to them. It is variously identified with Shetland, Iceland, and Norway.

"Where the Northern Ocean, in vast whirls, Boils round the naked melancholy isles
Of furthest Thule." Thomson: Autumn, 863.

¶ Ultima Thule: The farthest Thule; the end of the world.

thū-līte, s. [After Thule, the ancient name for a country far north; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A rose-red variety of Zoisite (q. v.), with specific gravity, 3.124, strongly dichroic parallel to the vertical axis. The original was found at Souland, Telemarken, Norway.

thūmb (b silent), thōmb, thombe, s. [A. S. thuma, thūma; cogn. with Dut. duim; Sw. tumme; O. H. Ger. drūmo; Ger. daumen, all=a thumb; Icel. thumall=the thumb of a glove. From the same root as tumid (q. v.).]

1. The short thick finger of the human hand, or the corresponding member of other animals; the first of the fingers, differing from the others in having but two phalanges.

"To identify him should have been easy; for he had a wound in the face, and had lost a thumb."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xix.

2. The part of a glove which covers the thumb.

¶ (1) Rule of thumb: [RULE, s.]

(2) To bite the thumb at: [BITE, v.]

(3) Under one's thumb: Completely under one's power or influence; completely subservient to another.

"He is under the thumb of that doctor."—H. Kingsley: Geoffry Hamlyn, ch. ix.

thumb-band, s. A twist of anything as thick as the thumb.

"Tie thumb-bands of hay around them."—Mortimer.

thumb-bit, s. A piece of meat eaten on bread, so called from the thumb being placed on it. (Hal-livell.)

thumb-blue, subst. Indigo in the form of small balls or lumps used by laundresses to give a clear or pure tint to linen, &c. So called because each lump is indented as if by thumb-marks.

thumb-cleat, s.

Naut.: A small cleat forming a leader to carry the bight of a rope.

thumb-flint, s.

Anthrop.: A popular name for a short form of scrapers, the longer varieties of which are sometimes known as "finger-flints." Evans (Ancient Stone Implements, p. 262), thinks that these names "though colloquially convenient, are not sufficiently definite to be worthy of being retained."

thumb-latch, s. A kind of door-latch, so called from the lever being pressed by the thumb in order to open the latch.

thumb-mark, s. A mark left by the impression of the thumb, as on the pages of a book or the like; hence, any similar mark.

"There are marks of age,
There are thumb-marks on thy margin,
Made by hands that clasped thee rudely."
Longfellow: Old Danish Song-book.

thumb-nut, s. A nut having wings by which it is turned by the thumb and finger to tighten upon its bolt; a butterfly-nut.

thumb-ring, subst. A ring worn on the thumb. (Shakesp.: Henry IV., Pt. I., ii. 4.)

thumb-pot, s. The smallest size of flower-pots.

"Tiny plants in thumb-pots were also used."—Field, Jan. 1, 1887.

thumb-screw, s.

1. A screw with a flat-sided head adapted to be turned by the finger and thumb.

2. An old instrument of torture to break the thumb-joint; a thumb-kin.

"He had brought into use a little steel thumb-screw which gave such exquisite torment that it had wrung confessions even out of men on whom his Majesty's favorite boot had been tried in vain."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. vi.

1. A case, sheath, or covering of leather or other substance, to be worn on the thumb.

"Gloves cut into thumb-stalls."—Gayton: Festivous Notes, p. 97.

2. A sailor's thimble used in sail-making; it is made of iron, horn, or leather, and has the edges turned up to receive the thread. It is worn on the thumb to tighten the stitches.

†3. Ordn.: A stall of buckskin stuffed with hair, which a gunner wears on his thumb to cover the vent while the piece is being sponged and loaded.

thūmb (b silent), v. t. & i. [THUMB, s.]

A. Transitive:

1. To handle awkwardly; to play with the fingers; as, to thumb over a tune.

2. To mark, soil, or wear with the thumb or fingers, or by frequent handling.

"Within a week after it had arrived it had been thumbed by twenty families."—Macaulay: Hist. England, ch. iii.

B. Intrans.: To play on with the fingers.

thūmbed (b silent), a. [Eng. thumb, s.; -ed.]

1. Having thumbs.

2. Having thumb-marks.

thūmb'-īe-kīng, thūmb'-ī-kīng (b silent), s. pl. [THUMBKINS.]

thūmb'-kīng (b silent), s. pl. [Eng. thumb, s.; dimin. suff. -kin.] A thumbscrew; an instrument of torture for compressing the thumbs, much used by the Inquisition in Spain, and occasionally in Britain, when it was desired to obtain a confession or recantation from any person by causing him exquisite pain without endangering his life. Thumbkins were last used in Britain in 1684, on Prof. Carstairs. Called also thumbiekins and thumbikins.

"I'll set those to look after him shall keep him as fast as if his legs were in the boots, or his fingers in the thumbikins."—Scott: Old Mortality, ch. ix.

thūmb'-lēss (b silent), a. [Eng. thumb, s.; -less.] Having no thumb; hence, awkward, clumsy, unskillful.

"The servants thumblesse."

Herrick: Hesperides, p. 333.

thumbless-monkeys, s. pl.

Zool.: A term sometimes applied to the species of two genera, Colobos and Ateles, because the first digit of their fore limbs is functionless. The first genus is from the western hemisphere, the second from the eastern.

thū-mēr-stōne (th as t), s. [A trans. of Ger. thumerstein.] [THUMITE.]

thū-mīte (th as t), s. [After Thum, Saxony where found; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: The same as AXINITE (q. v.).

thūm'-mīm, s. [Heb. tummim, thummim=perfection; from tamam=to complete; to be perfect.] [URIM.]

thūmp, s. [THUMP, v.] The sound made by the sudden fall of a heavy body, as by a blow with a club, the fist, &c., the stroke of a hammer, or the like; a heavy blow given with something thick.

"The distant forge's swinging thump profound;
Or yell, in the deep woods, of lonely hound."

Wordsworth: Evening Walk.

thūmp, v. t. & i. [Cf. Icel. dumpa=to thump; Sw. dial. dumpa=to thump, dumpa=to make a noise.]

A. Trans.: To beat or strike with something thick or heavy.

"Thump! then see thou thump thy master well."—Henry VI., Pt. II., ii. 3.

Thumb-screw.

B. Intrans.: To strike or fall on with heavy blows; to beat.

"A ragged musician to thump monotonously on a tom-tom."—London Daily Telegraph.

thūmp'-ēr, s. [Eng. thump, v.; -er. For sense 2 cf. whopper.]

1. One who or that which thumps.

"O let me ring the fore bell,

And here are thumpers."

Beaum. & Flet.: Mad Lover, v.

2. Some person or thing very great or huge. (Colloq.)

"Small as you will, if 'twas a bumper,"

Centum for one would be a thumper."

Byron: Critical Remarks upon Passages in Horace.

thūmp'-īng, a. [THUMP, v.] Large, heavy, huge; very great.

"You've run up a thumping bill, and I'll warrant you'll pay it like a lord."—O Keefe: Fontainebleau, iii. 1.

thūn-bērg'-ī-a, subst. [Named after Carl Petter Thunberg (1743-1828), a Swedish traveler, botanist, and professor of natural history at Upsal.]

Bot.: A genus of Gardeniæ, sometimes made a synonym of Gardenia. Involucre two-leaved; calyx about twelve-toothed; corolla campanulate; capsule beaked, two-celled. Handsome and fragrant climbers, cultivated in gardens for the beauty of their flowers. Thunbergia fragrans has cordate, acuminate leaves; T. grandiflora angular, cordate leaves, larger flowers with no inner calyx, and the anthers bearded and spurred. Both are natives of the East Indies.

thūn-bērg'-ī-ē-æ, subst. pl. [Mod. Latin thunbergi(a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -eæ.]

Bot.: A tribe of Acanthaceæ. Seeds with a horny expansion of the placenta.

thūn'-dēr, thōn-der, thōn-er, thun-dir, s. [Prop. thuner, from A. S. thunor=thunder, allied to thunian=(1) to become thin, to be stretched out, (2) to rattle, to thunder; gethun=a loud noise; cogn. with Dut. donder; Icel. Thórr=Thor, the god of thunder; Dan. torden; Sw. tordön; O. H. Ger. thonar; Ger. donner=thunder; Lat. tono=to thunder, tonitrus=thunder; A. S. tonian, thunrian=to thunder; Sansc. tan=to sound. For the excrescent d, cf. gender, tender, &c.]

1. Lit. & Physics: The violent report which follows a flash of lightning. It commences the same moment as the flash; but, as the sound travels only at the rate of about 1,100 feet a second, while light does so at the rate of 200,000 miles, the flash of the lightning is the first to be perceived, and thus a means is afforded of calculating the distance of the lightning. The noise of the thunder arises from the disturbance produced in the air by the electric discharge, but why the sound should be so prolonged has been differently explained. The old hypothesis was that the sound was echoed from every precipice, from every building, and from every cloud in the sky. Another is that the lightning itself is a series of discharges, each producing a particular sound according to the distance at which it commences, and the varying densities of the portions of air which it traverses before reaching the ear. A third conjecture is that the noise arises from the zigzag movement of the electric fluid, the air at each salient angle being at its maximum compression. (Ganot.)

II. Figuratively:

1. The destructive agent in a thunderstorm; a discharge of lightning; a thunderbolt.

2. Any loud noise.

"The Grecian train

With answering thunders fill'd the echoing plain."

Pope: Homer's Iliad, xlii, 1,059.

3. An awful or startling denunciation, or threat.

4. Vigor, efficiency, force. (Brewer.)

thunder-ax, s.

Anthrop.: A popular name for a celt, from the idea that they were "thunderbolts."

"The country folks of the West of England still hold that the thunder-axes they find fell from the sky."—Tylor: Early Hist. Mankind (ed. 1878) p. 224.

thunder-bearer, s. He in whose hands is the thunder.

"I do not bid the thunder-bearer shoot."

Shakesp.: Lear, ii. 1.

thunder-beat, v. t. To strike with a thunderbolt.

"He them thunder-bet whereso he went."

Hudson: Judith, v. 397.

thunder-bird, s.

Anthrop.: An imaginary bird occurring in the mythology of races of low culture, and personifying thunder or its cause.

"Among the Caribs, Brazilians, Harvey Islanders, and Karens, Bechuanas and Basutos, we find legends of a flapping or flashing Thunder-bird, which seem to translate into myth the thought of thunder and lightning descending from the upper regions of the air, the home of the eagle and the vulture."—Tylor: Prim. Cult. (ed. 1873), i. 363.

fate, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camēl, hēr, thēre; pīne, pīt, sīre, sīr, marīne; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb. cūre. unite, cūr. rūle, fūll; trȳ. Sȳrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

thunder-blasted, adj. Struck or blasted by lightning.

thunder-burst, s. A burst or peal of thunder.

thunder-clap, s. A clap, peal, or burst of thunder; the sudden report of a discharge of atmospheric electricity.

"Rayne, hayle, and snowe do pay them sad penance,
And dreadful thunder-claps (that make them quake)
With flames and flashing lights that thousand changes make." Spenser: F. Q. (Of Mutabilitie), vii. 23.

thunder-cloud, s.

Meteor.: A cloud from which lightning flashes forth, or may do so, with accompanying thunder. It is a modification of the nimbus, but, as a rule, is darker than the ordinary type of that cloud. When several exist the space between them is sometimes of a peculiar color. They vary greatly in elevation, some being very low—a good many about 3,000 feet high, while others have been known to reach 16,000 feet in elevation.

"The myth . . . resolves itself into simple phrases, which spoke of the thunder-cloud as looming over the city from day to day."—Cox: Introd. to Mythology, p. 1 21.

thunder-crack, s. A clap of thunder.

"Nor is he moved with all the thunder-cracks
Of tyrants' threats, or with the surly brow Of Pow'r."—Daniel: To the Countess of Cumberland.

thunder-daisy, s.

Bot.: Chrysanthemum leucanthemum.

thunder-dart, s. A thunderbolt.

"No worke it seem'd of earthly craftsmans wit,
But rather wrought by his owne industry,
That thunder-dartes for Jove his syre doth fit."
Spenser: Visions of Bellay.

thunder-darter, s. He who darts the thunder; Jove.

"O thou great thunder-darter of Olympus, forget that thou art Jove, the king of gods."—Shakesp.: Troilus and Cressida, ii. 3.

thunder-dint, subst. The noise of thunder; a thundering noise.

thunder-dirt, subst. The New Zealand name for the gelatinous volva of leodictyon, formerly eaten by the natives. (Berkeley.)

thunder-drop, subst. One of the large, heavy, thinly-scattered drops of rain which precede a thunderstorm.

"As thunder-drops fall on a sleeping sea."

Tennyson: Dream of Fair Women, 122.

thunder-fish, s.

1. Malapterurus electricus. [MALAPTERURUS.]
2. Misgurnus fossilis. (Nature, March 25, 1886, p. 497.) [WEATHER-FISH.]

thunder-fit, subst. A shock or noise resembling thunder.

thunder-flower, s.

Botany:

(1) Stellaria holostea: A correspondent of Messrs. Britten & Holland suggests that the name may have arisen from the fact that the immature capsule contains air, and, when pressed between the finger and thumb, as it often is for amusement by children, it bursts with a slight report.

(2) Papaver rhœas.

(3) Lychnis vespertina.

thunder-god, s.

Anthropology: A deity who, in the mythology of races of low culture, are supposed to preside over or cause thunder.

"The place of the Thunder-god in polytheistic religion is similar to that of the Rain-god, in many cases even to entire coincidence. But his character is rather of wrath than of beneficence, a character which we have half lost the power to realize, since the agonizing terror of thunderstorms which appals savage minds has dwindled away in ours, now that we behold in it not the manifestation of divine wrath, but the restoration of electric equilibrium."—Tylor: Prim. Cult. (ed. 1873), ii. 262.

thunder-head, s. A popular name for the cloud called Cumulus.

thunder-master, s. Master of the thunder.

"No more, thou thunder-master, shew Thy spite on mortal flies."

Shakesp.: Cymbeline, v. 4.

thunder-mug, subst. A chamber pot; a jordan. (U S. Colloq.)

thunder-music, subst. Music having the deep rolling sound of thunder. (Tennyson: In Mem., lxxxvii. 7.)

thunder-peal, s. A peal or clap of thunder.

"And who, 'mid thunder-peals can hear Our signals of distress."

Byron: Stanzas Composed during a Thunderstorm.

thunder-pick, s. A popular name for a Belemnite. (H. B. Woodward: Geol. Eng. & Wales, p. 261.)

thunder-plant, s.

Bot.: Sempervivum tectorum.

thunder-proof, adject. Proof or secure against lightning.

thunder-rod, s. A lightning-rod (q. v.).

thunder-shoot, v. t. To strike or destroy by a thunderbolt or lightning.

"Thunder-shot and turned to ashes as Olympus."—Ful-ler: Holy and Profane State, V. vi. 9.

thunder-shower, subst. A shower which accompanies thunder.

"And through his side the last drops, ebbing slow
From the red gash, fall heavy, one by one,
Like the first of a thunder-shower."

Byron: Child Harold, iv. 140.

thunder-splintered, adj. Broken to pieces by lightning.

"Shooting abruptly from the dell Its thunder-splintered pinnacle."

Scott: Lady of the Lake, i. 11.

thunder-stone, s. A thunderbolt.

"And, thus unbrac'd, Casca, as you see,
Have bared my bosom to the thunder-stone."

Shakesp.: Julius Caesar, i. 3.

thunder-strike, v. t.

*1. Lit.: To strike, blast, or injure by lightning, or as by lightning; to strike as with a thunderbolt.

"The armaments which thunder-strike the walls Of rock-built cities, bidding nations quake."

Byron: Child Harold, iv. 187.

2. Fig.: To astonish or strike dumb, as with something terrible. (Used only in the past participle.)

"She stood as it were thunder-stricken with amazement."—Sidney: Arcadia, bk. iii.

thunder-stroke, [s. A thunder-clap; a stroke or blast of lightning.

"Saul saw, and fell to earth, as falls the oak,
At once, and blasted by the thunder-stroke."

Byron: Saul.

thunder-struck, a.

1. Lit.: Struck, blasted, or injured by lightning.

2. Fig.: Amazed; struck dumb, as by something surprising or terrible suddenly presented to the mind or view.

thunder-thump, s. A thunderbolt.

"Thou that throwest the thunder-thumps."

Googe: Eglogs, iv.

thunder-tube, s. A fulgurite (q. v.).

thŭn'-dēr, v. i. & t. [THUNDER, s.]

A. Intransitive:

1. Lit.: To make thunder; to produce the noise of thunder. (Often used impersonally; as, It thundered yesterday.)

"The Lord also thundered in the heavens, and the Highest gave His voice."—Psalms xviii. 13.

II. Figuratively:

1. To make a loud noise like thunder, particularly a loud, continued noise.

"Loud clamors shake the shore.

The horses thunder; earth and ocean roar!"

Pope: Homer's Iliad, xxiv. 405.

2. To utter loud denunciations or threatenings; to cry out loudly.

"The orators on the other side thundered against sinful associations."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xiii.

B. Transitive:

1. To emit as with the sound of thunder; to utter or issue by way of threat or denunciation; to denounce loudly.

"Who thunders to his captives blood and death."

Shakesp.: Henry VI., Pt. III., ii. 1.

*2. To lay on with violence or vehemence.

thŭn'-dēr-bōlt, v. t. [THUNDERBOLT, s.] To strike with thunder.

"With his tongue he'll thunderbolt the world."

Return from Parnassus, ii. 2.

thŭn'-dēr-bōlt, s. [Eng. thunder, and bolt.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Lit.: A popular and erroneous term implying (as was anciently believed) that thunder somehow sends forth a destructive bolt or dart. A so-called thunderbolt is really a stream of lightning passing from one part of the heavens to the other, and especially one which reaches the earth and does damage. Lightning in certain cases can leave behind it a vitrified tube, called a Fulgurite (q. v.), which, however, is not flung or darted, but is created by vitrification on the spot where it is found. Other bodies of mineral origin have been popularly credited with being thunderbolts.

"Kings and monarchs aspire still higher, and would be gods; and yet they rest not so, unless they may have the power to flash lightnings and shoot thunderbolts, as well as Jupiter."—P. Holland: Plutarch, p. 125.

2. Figuratively:

*1) A daring or irresistible hero.

(2) A dreadful threat, denunciation, censure, or the like, proceeding from some high authority; a fulmination.

"He severely threatens such with the thunderbolt of excommunication."—Hakewill: On Providence.

(3) Something very dreadful, threatening, or astonishing.

"A greater wreck, a deeper fall,
A shock to one—a thunderbolt to all."

Byron: Mazeppa, i.

II. Technically:

1. Bot. (pl.): (1) Lychnis vespertina; (2) Papaver rhœas; (3) Silene inflata.

2. Her.: The thunderbolt is represented as a twisted bar in pale, inflamed at each end, surmounting two jagged darts in saltire, between two wings expanded, with streams of fire issuing from the center.

3. Palæont.: [BELEMNITE.]

4. Petrol.: A name frequently given to the nodules of marcasite (q. v.), which are abundant in the chalk formation.

thunderbolt-stone, s. A Thunderbolt. flint. (See extract.)

"It is to be noticed that these Sioux, among their varied fancies about thunder-birds and the like, give unusually well a key to the great thunderbolt myth which recurs in so many lands. They consider the lightning entering the ground to scatter there in all directions thunderbolt-stones, which are flints, &c., their reason for this notion being the very natural one, that these siliceous stones actually produce a flash when struck."—Tylor: Prim. Cult. (ed. 1873), ii. 262.

thŭn'-dēr-ēr, s. [Eng. thunder, v.; -er.] One who thunders; specif., an epithet applied by the ancients to Jupiter, from the fact that he alone was credited with the power of hurling thunderbolts.

"For by the black infernal Styx I swear, (That dreadful oath which binds the Thunderer)." Pope: Thebais, 412.

¶ The Thunderer: An epithet applied to The Times newspaper (London) originally on account of a series of strong articles contributed by Mr. Edward Sterling in the early part of this century.

thŭn'-dēr-īng, thun-dre-yng, thun-dring, thun-dryng, pr. par., a. & s. [THUNDER, v.]

A. As pr. par.: (See the verb.)

B. As adjective:

1. Lit.: Emitting thunder.

II. Figuratively:

1. Producing or attended by a loud noise or rumbling like thunder or artillery.

"Foul fall the hand which bends the steel Around the courser's thundering heel."

Scott: Norman Horse-shoe, i.

2. Very great, large, or extraordinary.

"I was drawing a thundering fish out of the water."—T. Brown: Works, i. 219.

C. As subst.: The noise or report of the discharge of lightning; thunder.

"And leitis and voices and thundryngis came out of the trone."—Wycliffe: Apocalips iv.

Thundering Legion, s.

1. A Roman legion containing some Christians, which (A. D. 174) fought under Marcus Antoninus against the Marcomanni. The Roman army was shut up in a defile and ready to perish with thirst, when a thunderstorm with heavy rain relieved them of their distress, and so terrified the enemy that a complete victory was gained. The Christians attributed the deliverance to the prayer which they had just before presented, and considered it miraculous. The heathens also considered the interposition supernatural, but ascribed it to Jupiter, Mercury, or to the power of magic. (Dion Cassius: Roman Hist., lxxi. 8; Eusebius: Eccles. Hist., v. 5.)

2. A legion composed of Christian soldiers raised in the Thebais, and led by St. Maurice.

¶ The name existed long before it was applied to either of these two legions.

thŭn'-dēr-īng-lŷ, adv. [Eng. thundering; -ly.] In a thundering manner; with thunder.

thŭn'-dēr-lēss, a. [English thunder, s.; -less.] Unattended by thunder or noise.

"Thunderless lightnings striking under sea."
Tennyson: To the Queen.

thŭn'-dēr-ōŭs, thŭn'-dreŭs, a. [Eng. thunder, s.; -ous.]

1. Producing, discharging, or emitting thunder; thundery.

"Notus, and Afer, black with thunderous clouds From Sierra Lionea." Milton. P. L., x. 702.

bōil, bōy; pōut, jōwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, aş; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f. -cian, -tian = şan. -tion, -sion = şŭn; tion, -şion = zhŭn. -tious, -cious, -sious = şŭs. -ble, -dle, &c. = beş, deş.

2. Making a great noise like thunder; giving a loud and deep sound; sonorous.

"Whirlwinds and thundrous storms his chariot drew." Brome; Paraphrase of Job.

3. Very loud; like thunder.

"That berg . . . split in three portions with thunderous sound."—London Daily Telegraph.

thūn'-dēr-ōūs-lŷ, adv. [Eng. thunderous; -ly.] In a thunderous manner; with thunder, or a noise like thunder.

"A veritable lion, as large as any at present existing, whose midnight roar to-day rolls thunderously in the jungle of Africa."—London Daily Telegraph.

thūn'-dēr-storm, subst. [Eng. thunder, s., and storm, s.] A storm accompanied with thunder.

Thunderstorms are much more common in tropical countries where the heat is greater and the evaporation more rapid than in temperate climes, and various arctic navigators report that they become rare about 70°, and are wholly absent above 75° N. In India they are most frequent during the months of the monsoon. Everywhere they are more common in summer than in winter. As the electricity of salt water is the same as that of the atmosphere, they are less common on the sea than on the land.

thūn'-dēr-ŷ, thūn'-drŷ, a. [English thunder, subst.; -y.]

1. Having the character of, or resembling thunder.

"A cannon's thundry roaring ball."

Sylvester: Du Bartas.

2. Accompanied with thunder; as, thundry weather.

thūn'-nŷ, s. [TUNNY.]

thurgh, prep. [THROUGH.] thurgh-fare, s. [Middle Eng. thurgh=through, and fare.] A thoroughfare.

"This world nys but a thurghfare ful of woo,
And we ben pilgrims, passyng to and froo."

Chaucer: C. T., 2,849.

thurgh-out, prep. or adv. [THROUGHOUT.] thūr'-i-ble, subst. [Lat. thuribulum, turibulum, from thus, tus (genit. thuris, turis)=frankincense, from Gr. thyō=to offer sacrifice, to sacrifice; thyos=a sacrifice, an offering.]

Eccles.: A censer, a vessel for burning incense. Thuribles of some kind must be as old as use of incense in the services of the Church; but their present form, according to Martigny, dates only from the twelfth century. The modern thurible consists of a metallic vessel or cup, sometimes of gold or silver, but more commonly of brass or latcen, in which burning charcoal is placed, with a movable perforated cover. Chains are attached, so that the thurible may be waved to and fro for the readier dispersion of the smoke of the incense, which is thrown on the live charcoal. [THURIFER.] thūr'-i-fēr, s. [Eccles. Latin thuriferarius=a thurifer; from Latin thus (genit. thuris)=incense, and fero=to bear.]

Eccles.: The attendant at high mass, solemn vespers, and benediction, who uses the thurible, either by simply waving it to and fro [see cut a under Thurible], or for incensing the clergy, choir, and congregation, and at certain times presents it to the officiating priest that he may incense the altar [see cut b under Thurible] or the Host. Strictly speaking, the office of thurifer belongs to the acolyte, the highest of the four Minor Orders, but all the functions of the acolyte are now freely performed by laymen.

thū-rīf-ēr-ōūs, a. [THURIFER.] Producing or bearing frankincense.

thūr'-i-fī-cā'-tion, s. [Lat. thus (genit. thuris)=frankincense, and facio=to make.] The act of censuring or fuming with incense; the act of burning incense.

"Some semblance of an idolatrous thurification."—Bp. Hall: Cases of Conscience, disc. 3, case 3.

thūr'-i-fŷ, v. t. & i. [THURIFICATION.]

A. Trans.: To perfume with odors as from a thurible; to cense.

"Sensed and thurified in the smoake."—Nashe: Lenten Stuffe.

B. Intrans.: To scatter incense; to cense.

Thū-rīn'-gī-an, a. & s. [See def.]

A. As adj.: Of or pertaining to Thuringia, a region of Central Germany, which comprised parts of the Prussian province of Saxony and the Saxon duchies.

B. As subst.: A native or inhabitant of Thuringia.

thū-rīng'-ite, s. [After Thuringia, where first found; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A massive mineral stated to consist of an aggregate of minute scales. Hardness 2.5; specific gravity, as obtained by various mineralogists, 3.151-3.197; luster, dull; color, dark pistachio-green; fracture, sub-conchoidal. Composition: A hydrated silicate of alumina, sesquioxide and protoxide of iron, with a little magnesia. Dana (if half the water be basic), computes from the analyses the formula $\frac{1}{2}(\text{RO}, \text{HO})_3 + \frac{1}{2}(\text{Al}_2\text{O}_3\text{Fe}_2\text{O}_3)_3\text{SiO}_2 + 4\text{HO}$.

thūrl, s. [A. S. thyrel=a hole.] [THRILL.]

Mining:

1. A short communication between adits.

2. A long adit in a coal-pit.

thūrl, v. i. [THURL, s.]

Mining: To make a breach into former workings or gate-roads.

thūr'-rōck, thur-rok, thor-rocke, s. [A. S. thurruck=a boat.]

1. The hold of a ship.

"The same harme do sometime the smal droges of water that enteren thurgh a small crevice in the thurrrok, and in the bottom of the ship."—Chaucer: Parsones Tale.

2. A receptacle, a sink.

"Then cometh idelnesse that is the gate of all harms . . . This idelnesse is the thurrrok of all wicked and villains thoughtes."—Chaucer: Parsones Tale.

Thūrŷ'-dāŷ, Thurs-dei, Thores-day, Thors-day, s. [Thors-day, i. e., the day of Thor, the god of thunder. [THOR.] A. S., thunres-dæg=the day of thunder; thunres (genit. of thunor)=thunder, and dæg=day; Icel. thórs-dagr, from thórs (genit. of thórr)=Thor, thunder, and dagr=a day; Dut. Donderdag, from donder=thunder; Sw. & Dan. Torsdag; Ger. Donnerstag. The Romans similarly called the day dies Jovis=the day of Jove or Jupiter, the god corresponding to the Scandinavian Thor; hence, Ital. Giovedì; Fr. Jeudi.] The fifth day of the week.

thūrst (1), s. [THIRST.]

thūrst (2), s. [Etym. doubtful.]

Mining: The ruins of the incumbent strata after the pillars and stalls are wrought out.

thūs, adv. [A. S. dhus, prob. an instrumental case of dhes=this; cf. O. S. thus=this; thus, instrumental case of thesa=this; O. Fris. thus; Dan. dus.] [THIS.]

1. In this manner.

(1) Pointing to something present and in view; generally accompanied with a gesture explaining the meaning.

"I extend my hand to him thus."—Shakesp.: Twelfth Night, ii. 5.

(2) Pointing to something which follows immediately.

"Reason thus with life."

Shakesp.: Measure for Measure, iii. 1.

(3) Pointing to something which has preceded, or has been said.

"Why hast thou thus dealt with us?"—Luke ii. 48.

2. Pointing to something following as an effect or result; accordingly, consequently, therefore, so.

"Thus we are agreed."

Shakesp.: Antony and Cleopatra, ii. 6.

3. Denoting degree or quality; so; to this extent or degree.

"I am thus bold to put your grace in mind."

Shakesp.: Richard III., iv. 2.

¶ Thus far: So far; to this point or degree.

"Thus far you shall answer."

Shakesp.: Cymbeline, i. 4.

thūs, s. [Lat.] Frankincense (q.v.). Also applied to the resin of the spruce-fir.

Thūs-nēl'-dā, subst. [Scandinavian (?) female name.]

Astron.: [ASTEROID, 219.]

thūs'-sōck, s. [TUSSOCK.]

thū'-yā, s. [THUJA.]

thū'-ŷ'-tēs, s. [THUITES.] thwäck, v. t. [A variant from Mid. Eng. thakken=to stroke; A. S. thaccian=to stroke; cogn. with Icel. thökka=to thwack, to thump.] [WHACK.]

1. To strike with something flat, blunt, and heavy; to bang, to thump, to beat, to thrash.

"Here's he that was wont to thwack our general."—Shakesp.: Coriolanus, iv. 5.

*2. To slap, to dash.

"He thwacks fourteene scriptures into the margent."—Bp. Hall: Apologie against Brownists.

thwäck, s. [THWACK, v.] A heavy blow with something blunt and hard; a thump, a bang.

"After plenty of ludicrous distress, as well as many a serious thwack, the Danes, who seemed repeatedly to be on the eve of victory, were at last overcome."—Knight: Pictorial Hist. Eng., ii. 876.

thwäck'-ēr, s. [Eng. thwack, v.; -er.] One who or that which beats or thwacks. [THWACKING-FRAME.] thwäck'-īng, pr. par. or a. [THWACK, v.] thwacking-frame, s.

Tile-making: A table with a curved top, upon which a half-dried pantile is beaten to form. The tool by which the upper side is beaten has the shape of the segment of a cylinder, and is called the thwacker.

thwāite, s. [Icel. thveit, thveiti=a piece or parcel of land, from the same root as A. S. thwitan=to chop, to cut off.] [THWITE.] In the north of England a parcel of ground reclaimed and converted to tillage. Thwaite occurs frequently as the second element in place names in the Lake district, as Crossthwaite, Applethwaite, &c.

thwaite, s. [TWAITE (1).]

thwärt, thwert, adv., a., prep. & s. [Icel. thvert, (neut. of thverr)=across, transverse; cogn. with Dan. tvær (a.)=transverse; tvært=across; Sw. tvär=cross, unfriendly; tvärt=rudely; Dut. dwars=cross, crossly; A. S. thweorh=perverse, transverse; M. H. Ger. dwerch, twerch; Ger. zwerch=across, awry, obliquely; Goth. thwairhs=cross, angry.]

A. As adverb: Transversely, obliquely, across, athwart.

"Whether thwart or flatly it did lyte."

Spenser: F. Q., VI. vi. 30.

B. As adjective:

1. Transverse, oblique; lying or being across something else.

"The slant lightning whose thwart flame, driv'n down Kindles the gummy bark of fir or pine."

Milton: P. L., x. 1,075.

2. Perverse, obstinate, cross-grained.

"His herte dho wurdh thwert."

Genesis and Exodus, 3,099.

C. As prep.: Across, athwart.

"Thwart her horse."—Spenser: F. Q., III. vii. 43.

D. As substantive:

*1. Ord. Lang.: Opposition, defiance.

"In thwart of your fair inclinations."—Mad. D'Arblay, Cecilia, bk. ii., ch. iii.

2. Naut.: One of the transverse planks which keep the sides of a boat asunder, like the beams of a ship, and serve as seats for the rowers. They are placed about two feet ten inches apart, from center to center, in single-banked boats, and three feet in double-banked boats.

thwart-hawse, adv.

Naut.: Across the hawse.

thwärt, thwert, v. t. & i. [THWART, adv.]

A. Transitive:

*1. To place or pass across; to cross.

"Swift as a shooting star
In autumn thwarts the night."

Milton: P. L., iv. 557.

*2. To cross.

"With their thwarted legs upon their monuments."—Fuller: Church Hist., III. iii. 11.

3. To cross, as a purpose; to frustrate or defeat; to traverse.

"A greater power than we can contradict Hath thwarted our intents; come, come away."

Shakesp.: Romeo and Juliet, v. 3.

B. Intransitive:

1. To go or move crosswise, across, or obliquely.

2. To be in opposition; to be opposed.

"It is easy to be imagined what reception any proposition shall find, that shall at all thwart with these internal oracles."—Locke.

3. To be perverse.

"Such shields tooke the name Clypei, i. chased and engraven, not in the old word in Latine Cluere, which signifieth to fight, or to bee well reputed, as our thwarting grammarians would with their subtle sophistrie seeme to etymologize and derive it."—P. Holland: Pliny, bk. xxxv. ch. iii.

thwärt'-ēr, s. [Eng. thwart; -er.]

1. One who or that which thwarts, frustrates, or defeats.

2. A disease in sheep, indicated by shaking, trembling, or convulsive motions.

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camel, hēr, thēre; pine, pīt, sīre, sīr, marīne; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rāle, fūll; trŷ, Sŷrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

thwârt'-lîng, pr. par., a. & s. [THWART, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As subst.: The act of one who thwarts; a frustrating.

"The thwartings of your dispositions."
Shakesp.: Coriolanus, iii. 2.

thwârt'-lîng-lÿ, adv. [Eng. thwarting; -ly.] In a thwarting manner; so as to thwart; in opposition.

thwârt'-lÿ, adv. [English thwart; -ly.] In a thwart manner; in opposition; crossly, perversely.

"Judging so thwartly."

Kethe, in Maitland: Reformation, p. 113.

thwârt'-ness, s. [English thwart; -ness.] The quality or state of being thwart; perverseness, untowardness.

thwârt'-ship, a. [Eng. thwart, and ship.]

Naut.: Lying across the vessel.

thwârt'-ships, adv. [THWARTSHIP.]

Naut.: Across the vessel.

thwite, thwite, thwyte, v. t. [A. S. thwitan.] To cut or clip with or as with a knife.

"A carfull eie must be had in thwitting and sharpning the graffe or impe."—P. Holland: Pliny, bk. xvii., ch. xiv.

thwit-el, s. [A. S., from thwitan=to cut.] A knife, a whittle.

"A Sheffield thwitel bare he in his hose."

Chaucer: C. T., 3,932.

thwit-ten, pa. par. or a. [THWITE.]

thwit'-tle, v. t. [A frequent. from thwite (q. v.).] To whittle (q. v.).

thwōng, s. [A. S. thwang.] A thong, a strap.

thworl, thworle, s. [WHORL.]

thÿ, a. [A shorter form of THINE (q. v.).] Of or pertaining to thee; relating to thee; the possessive pronoun of the second person singular.

"Who'll weep for thy deficiency?"

Tennyson: Two Voices.

thÿ-a-tîr'-a, s. [Lat.=an ancient city in Mysia in Asia Minor (?).] (Acts xvi. 14; Rev. ii. 18.)

Entom.: A genus of Noctuidæ, family Noctuidæ. Antennæ rather short, pubescent; abdomen long, rather slender. Larva not hairy.

Thÿ-ēs'-tē-an, a. [Lat. thyestes. See def. 1.]

1. Lit.: Of or belonging to Thyestes, the son of Pelops and brother of Atreus, who slew his two nephews, Tantalus and Pleisthenes, and served their flesh to their father, who partook of the dreadful meal.

2. Fig.: Cannibal.

"Did not popular rumor charge them with nocturnal orgies and Thyestean feasts?"—Farrar: Early Days of Christianity, ch. iv.

thÿ'-ine, a. [Gr. thuiños=of or belonging to the tree Thuia. [THUJA.] (See etym. & compound.)] thyne-wood, s. A kind of wood (xylin thuinon) mentioned in Rev. xviii. 12 as one of the articles in which the mystic Babylon dealt. It was mentioned also by the Greeks and Romans, the latter calling it Citrus. It was used for furniture, and for decorative purposes, and was probably Callitris quadrivalvis.

thÿ'-lā-çine, s. [THYLACINUS.]

Zoöl.: Thylacinus cynocephalus, from New Zealand, the largest predaceous marsupial now living. It is a little smaller than a wolf, dog-like in form; head elongated, muzzle pointed, ears moderate, erect, triangular. Color grayish-brown, with a series of transverse black bands on the hinder part of the back and loins; fur short and closely applied to the skin; tail of moderate length, thick at the base and tapering toward the apex, clothed with short hair. These animals are semi-plantigrade, walking partly on the toes and partly on the soles of the feet. They are very destructive to sheep, and for that reason the settlers have almost exterminated them in the more thickly populated parts of the island, but they still find shelter in the rocky glens of the mountainous region. Called also Tiger-Wolf, Zebra-Wolf, and Tasmanian Wolf or Hyena.

Thylacine.

thÿ-lā-çî-nūs, s. [Gr. thylakos=a bag, a sack, and kyōn=a dog.]

Zoöl.: A genus of Dasyuridæ (in classifications in which that family is sub-divided, of Dasyurinae), with one living species, Thylacinus cynocephalus, from Tasmania, though recent fragments of bones and teeth show that an allied species formerly inhabited the mainland of Australia. The marsupial bones are represented only by small unossified fibrocartilages, and the pouch (traces of which are more obvious in the male than in other marsupials), unlike that of the kangaroos, opens backward. The female produces four young at a birth.

thÿ-lā-cō-lē-ō, s. [Gr. thylakos=a pouch, a sack, and leōn=a lion.]

Palæont.: An extinct genus of Marsupials from the post-Tertiary deposits of Australia, with one species, Thylacoleo carnifex, of which nothing but the skull is known. The dentition is very anomalous, the functional teeth being reduced to one pair of large cutting incisors close to the median line, and one great, trenchant, compressed premolar. It was first described as a carnivorous marsupial, and named in accordance with its presumed habits, "as one of the fellest and most destructive of predatory beasts" but, as its affinities are certainly with the Phalangistidæ and Macropodidæ, and its dentition completely unlike that of any known predaceous animal, this view has been questioned. (Prof. Flower, in Encyc. Brit., xv. 383.)

thÿ-lā-cō-thēr'-ÿ-ūm, subst. [Gr. thylakos=a pouch, and thērion=a wild beast.]

Palæontology: Owen's name for Amphitherium (q. v.).

thÿ-māl'-lūs, s. [Gr. thymallos=an unidentified fish mentioned by Ælian (N. A., xiv. 22).]

Ichthy.: A genus of Salmonidæ, group Salvelini (q. v.), allied to Coregonus, from which it is principally distinguished by its rayed dorsal fin. There are five species, inhabiting clear streams of the north of Europe, Asia and North America, of which the best known are Thymallus signifer, the Poisson bleu of the Canadian voyageurs, and T. vulgaris, the Grayling (q. v.).

thÿme (th as t), tyme, s. [Fr. thym; Prov. thime; Ital. timo; Lat. thymus (q. v.).]

Botany:

1. The genus Thymus (q. v.).

2. In composition, in the word Water-thyme (q. v.).

thyme-oil, s.

1. Chem.: A volatile oil obtained by distilling garden thyme with water. It is colorless in the fresh state, has a pleasant pungent odor and camphoraceous taste, specific gravity=87-90, sparingly soluble in water, easily in alcohol and ether, and turns the plane of polarization to the left. It contains at least two hydrocarbons: Thymene, C₁₀H₁₆, and cymene, C₁₀H₁₄, and an oxygenated product, thymol, C₁₀H₁₄O.

2. Pharmacy: It is a powerful local stimulant, which may be used in toothache if applied by lint or cotton. Mixed with olive oil or spirit and camphor, it is a stimulating liniment in chronic rheumatism, sprains, bruises, &c.

thÿm'-eîd (th as t), s. [Eng. thyme; -id.]

Chem.: C₂₄H₃₄O₄. A product of the action of sunshine operating for several days on thymol contained in a sealed tube. It is obtained pure by mixing equal weights of thymol and thymolol in alcoholic solution, which then assumes a blood-red color, and deposits crystals which have a greenish metallic luster.

thÿ'-mē-lā, s. [Gr. thymelē=a place for sacrifice . . . a platform, an orchestra.]

Greek Antiq.: An elevation, in the form of an altar, in the center of the orchestra of a Greek theater, on which the leader of the chorus stood.

[Thÿ-mē-lā'-çē-æ, thÿ-mē-lē-æ (th as t), s. pl.] [Mod. Lat. thymel(æ); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -aceæ.]

Botany: Daphnads; an order of Perigynous Exogens, alliance Daphnales. Stem shrubby, rarely herbaceous, with a tenacious bark. Leaves exstipulate, entire. Flowers capitate or spiked, terminal, or axillary, often inclosed in an involucre. Calyx tubular, colored, the limb four or five-cleft; corolla wanting, or reduced to scale-like petals on the orifice of the calyx. Stamens eight, four, or two; style one; stigma undivided; ovary one-celled, with a single pendulous ovule; fruit hard, dry, nut-like or drupeaceous. Found in South America, the Cape of Good Hope, and Australia, the cooler parts of India, and in Europe. The bark is caustic. Known genera thirty-eight; species 300. [HERNANDIÆ.]

thÿ-mē-lā'-çē-oūs (or ceous as shūs, th as t), adj. [THYMELACÆ.]

Bot.: Belonging or relating to or like the Thymelacæ.

thÿ-mē-lā'-a (th as t), s. [THYMELE.]

Bot.: The typical genus of Thymelacæ (q. v.). Now made a synonym of Daphne (q. v.).

thÿ'-mēl-ē, s. [Gr. thymelē=a place of sacrifice, an altar, a temple; thÿō=to sacrifice.]

Entom.: A genus of Hesperidæ. Antennæ short, not terminating in a hook; hinder margin of the fore wings rounded; wings dark, with checkered spots, fringes checkered. The larva feeds on the raspberry. Found in moist places. (Stainton.) Other species are from tropical America, &c.

thÿ-mēl'-ic, adj. [Eng. thymel(a); -ic.] Of or belonging to a thymela (q. v.).

"There was another entrance to the thymelic platform."—Donaldson: Theater of the Greeks, p. 229.

thÿm'-ēne (th as t), s. [Mod. Latin thym(us); -ene.]

Chem.: C₁₀H₁₆. A hydrocarbon belonging to the camphene group, constituting the most volatile portion of oil of garden thyme. By repeated distillation it is obtained as a colorless oil, having an agreeable odor of thyme, specific gravity .868 at 20°, boiling at 160-165°, and deflecting the plane of polarization to the left.

thÿ'-mī-a-tēch-nÿ (th as t), s. [Gr. thymiama=incense, and technē=art.]

Med.: The art of employing perfumes in medicine. (Dunghlison.)

thÿm'-ic (th as t), a. [Lat. thym(us); Eng. suff. -ic.]

Anat.: Of or belonging to the thymus gland; as, the thymic vein.

thÿ-mīç'-ic (th as t), adj. [Formed from Eng. thymol (q. v.).] Derived from or containing thymol.

thymicic-acid, s. [THYMOTIC-ACID.]

thÿ-mō-îl (th as t), s. [Eng. thymo(l); -il.]

Chem.: C₁₂H₁₆O₂. Obtained by distilling thymol in presence of sulphuric acid and manganic peroxide. It comes over as a yellow oil, which may be purified by crystallization from ether-alcohol. It forms reddish-yellow four-sided shining laminae, having an aromatic odor. It is heavier than water, only sparingly soluble in alcohol, easily in ether, melts at 48°, and boils at about 235°.

thÿ-mō-îl'-a-mide (th as t), s. [Eng. thymoîl, and amide.]

Chem.: C₁₂H₁₅(NH₂)O. Formed by the action of dry ammonia gas on fused thymoîl. It is obtained as a dark red uncrystallizable mass, hard and brittle, but softens at 100°, so that it may be drawn into threads. Is soluble in alcohol.

thÿ-mō-îl'-ic (th as t), a. [Eng. thymoîl; -ic.] Contained in or derived from thymoîl (q. v.).

thymoîlic-acid, s.

Chem.: C₄₈H₆₂O₁₉. The product of the oxidation of thymoîl by the action of the air in presence of potash. The potassium salt of the acid which is formed is exhausted with alcohol and decomposed with hydrochloric acid. The acid is then obtained in dingy yellow uncrystallizable flocks sparingly soluble in water.

thÿ-mō-îl-ôl (th as t), s. [Eng. thymoîl; -ol.]

Chem.: C₁₂H₁₈O₃. A substance obtained by exposing thymoîl contained in a sealed tube to the action of sunshine for a period of several days. Recrystallized from alcohol, it is obtained in small, four-sided prisms, which are inodorous and tasteless, dissolve sparingly in water, easily in alcohol and ether, melt at 145°, and distill without decomposition at 290°.

thÿm'-ôl (th as t), s. [Mod. Lat. thym(us); -ol.]

Chem.: C₁₀H₁₃HO. Thymylic hydrate, thymylic alcohol, thymylic acid, thymic acid. The oxygenated constituent of thyme-oil and a homologue of phenol, obtained from thyme oil by fractional distillation, passing over chiefly between 225° and 235°. Purified by recrystallization from alcohol, it is obtained in transparent rhomboidal plates. It has a mild odor and aromatic taste, a specific gravity=1.0285 in the solid state, and does not act on polarized light, melts at 44°, and boils at about 230°. It is almost insoluble in water, soluble in alcohol, ether, and strong acetic acid, and forms several substitution derivatives by the action of bromine or chlorine in the presence of sunshine. Thymol is an antiseptic and disinfectant, and is largely employed in the Listerian system.

thÿ-mōt'-ic (th as t), a. [From English thymol (q. v.).] Derived from or containing thymol.

thymotic-acid, s.

Chem.: C₁₁H₁₄O₃=C₁₀H₁₄O.CO₂. Thymylcarbonic acid. Prepared by heating thymol with sodium in a flask through which a stream of carbonic anhydride is passed, thymyl carbonate and thymotate of sodium being formed. From the latter hydrochloric acid throws down thymotic acid in colorless flocks. It is purified by distillation with water, and is obtained as a white, loosely-coherent, crystalline mass with silky luster. It is nearly insoluble in cold water, melts at 120°, dissolves in ferric chloride with fine blue color, the same color being immediately produced in its neutral solutions.

bōil, bōÿ; pōut, jōwī; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, t̄his; sin, aç; expect, Xenophon, ex̄ist. ph=f. -cian, -tian=shān. -tion, -sion=shūn; -t̄ion, -çion=zhūn. -tious, -cious, -sious=shūs. -ble, -dle, &c.=bēl, dēl.

thym'-t-tide (th as t), s. [Eng. thymot(ic); -ide.] Chemistry: $C_{11}H_{12}O_2$. Produced by the action of pentachloride of phosphorus on thymotic acid. It crystallizes from alcohol in white microscopic needles, which melt at 187°.

thŷ'-mŷs (th as t), subst. [Mod. Lat., from Lat. thymus, thymum; Gr. thymos, thymon=thyme, from thyō=to sacrifice, either from its fragrance or because it was burnt on altars.]

Botany: Thyme; a genus of Origanidæ (q. v.). Small, often hoary, much-branched, highly-aromatic shrubs. Leaves small, entire, often with revolute margins; flowers whorled or capitate; calyx with ten to thirteen ribs, tubular, two-lipped, the upper lip three-toothed, the lower one bifid, the throat hairy; corolla with the upper lip erect, nearly plane, the lower one patent and trifid; stamens diverging, anther cells at first nearly parallel, afterward diverging; the connective, sub-triangular, small nuts nearly smooth. Known species forty, from the temperate parts of the Eastern Hemisphere. The Lemon or Lemon-scented thyme (T. citriodorus) is a variety of T. serpyllum, cultivated in gardens for its agreeable smell. T. chamædrys, formerly regarded as distinct, is now placed under it as a sub-species. It is used in India in diseases of the eyes and stomach, and on the Chenab as a vermifuge. T. vulgaris is Garden Thyme. It is a small much-branched shrub, a native of the southern countries of Europe, from Portugal to Greece. It is a pungent aromatic, much used in cookery.

Anat.: An elongated, glandular-like body, with two lobes which touch each other, situated partly in the thorax, partly in the lower region of the neck. It reaches its greatest size at about the second year of life, then ceases to grow, and finally dwindles into a mere vestige. It is supposed to be in some way connected with the elaboration of the blood in infancy. Its name refers to its resemblance to the flowers of thyme.

thŷm'-ŷ (th as t), adj. [Eng. thym(e); -y.] Of the nature of or abounding with thyme; hence, fragrant.

thŷm'-ŷl (th as t), s. [Eng. thym(ol); -yl.] Chem.: $C_{10}H_{18}$. The radical of thymol and its derivatives.

thymyl sulphuric-acid, s.

Chemistry: $C_{10}H_{14}HSO_4$. Sulphothymic acid. Formed by the action of oil of vitriol on thymol. Its aqueous solution evaporated in a vacuum crystallizes in translucent pearly tables or prisms, which are very soluble in water. With bases it forms a series of crystalline compounds.

thŷ-mŷl'-ic (th as t), adj. [Eng. thymyl; -ic.] Contained in or derived from thymol (q. v.).

thymylic-acid, alcohol, or hydrate, subst. [THYMOL.]

thŷn'-nich'-thŷs, subst. [Gr. thynnos=a tunny (q. v.), and ichthys=a fish.]

Ichthy. & Palæont.: A genus of Cyprinidæ, group Cyprinina, with three species, from the East Indies. Specimens have been found in the Miocene.

thŷn'-nī-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. thynn(us), 2; Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Entom.: An old family of Fossorial Hymenoptera, now merged in Sapygidæ.

thŷn'-nŷs, s. [Lat., from Gr. thynnos=the tunny (q. v.), from thynō=to rush fast, to dart along.]

1. Ichthy. & Palæont.: A genus of Scombridæ, with several species, ranging over tropical and temperate seas. First dorsal continuous, spines feeble; from six to nine finlets behind the dorsal and anal; scales of pectoral crowded, forming a corselet; a longitudinal keel on each side of the tail. Not uncommon in Eocene and Miocene formations.

*2. Entom.: A genus of Thynnidæ (q. v.).

thyr-ē-ō (yr as ir), pref. [THYRO-.]

thyr-ē-ōp-tēr-i'-næ (yr as ir), s. pl. [Prefix thyreo-; Greek pteron=a feather, a wing, and Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -inæ.]

Entom.: A sub-family of Truncatipennæ (q. v.). They seek their prey upon or under the bark of trees where small insects abound.

thyr-ō (yr as ir), pref. [Greek thyreos=a door-stone, a large, oblong shield, shaped like a door; thyra=a door.] Shaped like a door; oblong.

thyro-hyals, s. pl.

Anatomy: The great cornua of the hyoid bone. They project backward from its sides and end in rounded extremities.

Anat.: Of or belonging to the hyoid bone and the thyroid axis.

Thyro-hyoid arch:

Embryol.: The third of the branchial arches, or pharyngeal plates. It is related to the formation of the lower or great cornua and the body of the hyoid bone, and corresponds with the first true branchial arch of amphibia and fishes.

thyr'-ōid, thyr'-ē-ōid (yr as ir), adj. [Pref. thyro-, thyreo-, and Gr. eidōs=form.]

Anat.: Of an oblong form; shaped like an oblong shield.

thyroid-body, s.

Anat.: A soft, reddish and highly-vascular organ, consisting of two lateral lobes united by their lower ends by a transverse portion called the isthmus. It forms a rounded projection upon the trachea and the larynx. It is one of the vascular glands, or glands without ducts. Its function is unknown.

thyroid-cartilages, s. pl.

Anat.: Two flat lateral plates, continuous in front, forming a narrow angle like the letter V. In the male it is called Adam's apple.

thyroid-gland, s. [THYROID-BODY.]

thŷ-rōid'-ē-al, a. [Eng. thyroid; -eal.] Pertaining or relating to the thyroid-gland or cartilage.

thŷ-rōp'-tēr-a, s. [Gr. thyra=a door, and pteron=a wing.]

Zool.: A genus of Vespertilionidæ (q. v.), forming a separate group of that family (Dobson: Catal. Chir., p. 553). Muzzle elongated, slender; crown cone considerably elevated above the forehead; nasal apertures circular; ears funnel-shaped; bases of the thumbs and soles of the feet with highly specialized organs in the shape of hollow suctorial discs. There is but one species, Thyroptera tricolor, from Brazil. It is a small bat, with moderately long, dense fur, reddish-brown above and below, except breast and abdomen, which are pale yellowish white.

thŷr-sa-căn'-thŷs, subst. [Latin thyrs(us), and acanthus (q. v.).]

Bot.: A genus of Gendarusseæ. Tropical American shrubs or herbs, with large leaves and a long raceme of fascicled or cymose flowers.

thŷrse, s. [THYRSUS.]

thyrse-flower, s.

Bot.: The genus Thyrsacanthus (q. v.).

thŷrs'-i-form, a. [Latin thyrsus, and forma=form.]

Bot.: Resembling a thyrsus.

thŷr'-si-tēs, s. [THYRSUS.]

Ichthy.: A genus of Trichiuridæ (q. v.), with several species from tropical and sub-tropical seas. Body rather elongate, for the most part naked; first dorsal continuous, the spines are of moderate length, and extend on to the second; from two to six finlets behind the dorsal and anal; several strong teeth in jaws, and teeth on palatine bones. The species attain a length of from four to five feet, and are esteemed as food fishes.

thŷr'-sōid, thŷr'-sōid'-al, a. [Gr. thyrsos=a thyrsus, and eidōs=form, appearance.]

Bot.: Having somewhat the form of a thyrsus.

thŷr'-sū-la, subst. [Mod. Lat., dimin. from Lat. thyrsus (q. v.).]

Bot.: A kind of inflorescence consisting of a small cyme in the axil of a leaf. Occurs in the Labiates.

thŷr'-sŷs (pl. thŷr'-sŷ), s. [Latin, from Greek thyrsos=a light, straight shaft, a stalk.]

1. Class. Antiq.: One of the most common attributes or emblems of Bacchus and his followers. It consisted often of a spear or staff wrapped with ivy and vine branches or of a lance having the iron part thrust into a pine cone. In ancient representations it appeared in various forms. Thyrsi were carried by the Bacchanals in their hands, when celebrating the orgies of Bacchus.

"Round about him, fair Bacchantes, Bearing cymbals, flutes, and thyrses."
Longfellow: Drinking Song.

2. Bot.: A kind of inflorescence consisting of a panicle, the principal diameter of which is in the middle between the base and the apex; a compact panicle, the lower branches of which are shorter than those in the middle. It is at first centripetal and afterward centrifugal. Example, the Lilac.

thŷ-sā'-nī-a, subst. [Gr. thyrsos=fringe.]

Entom.: Part of the old genus Noctua=the Erebus of Latreille.

thŷ-sa-nōp-tēr, subst. [THYSANOPTERA.] Any individual of the Thysanoptera (q. v.).

thŷ-sa-nōp'-tēr-a, s. pl. [Mod. Latin, from Gr. thysanos=a fringe, and pteron=a wing.]

Entom.: Haliday's name for the group more generally known as Physopoda (q. v.).

thŷ-sa-nŷr'-a, s. pl. [Gr. thysanos=fringe, and oura=a tail.]

1. Entomology:

* (1) An order of Insecta founded by Latreille, embracing Thysanura Genuina [(2)] and Collembola (q. v.).

(2) According to Lubbock, an order of Insecta, while other authors make them a tribe of a larger order [(1)]. Antennæ long, many-jointed, tarsi from two to four joints, mandibles and maxillæ more or less exposed; maxillary palpi often long; labium more or less cleft in front; prothorax large; some of the abdominal segments bear pairs of appendages, and there are generally two or three caudal bristles. [COLLEMBOLA.]

2. Palæont.: Their remains are often found in amber, which is of Post-Tertiary date.

thŷ-sa-nŷr'-i-form, a. [Mod. Lat. thysanura, and Lat. forma=form.]

Entom.: Of or belonging to, or resembling the Thysanura (q. v.). Used by Swainson of a certain type of caterpillars, having the head armed with distinct spines, forming a crest round its hinder part, or divided into two hornlike points; the extremity of the body also terminating in two pointed processes. Examples, the larvæ of the large Nymphalidæ of Tropical America, Hipparchia, &c.

thŷ-sēlf', thi-self, thy-selfe, pron. [English thy, and self.] A reflexive pronoun used after thou (expressed or understood), to mark distinction with emphasis.

tī, s. [Native name.]

Botany:

1. Cordylone tī, formerly Dracena terminalis, a small liliaceous tree about twelve feet high, a native of the islands of the Pacific. Its great woody roots when baked become sweet and nutritious. When boiled it furnishes a syrup used as a substitute for sugar. When the roots are bruised, mixed with water, and fermented, they form an intoxicating beverage, and when distilled, an ardent spirit. The stems are used for fences, and the leaves as thatch for houses. They are also eaten by cattle, sheep, and goats. [CALODRACON.]

2. Cordylone australis and C. indivisa. (New Zealand.)

tī'-ar, s. [Fr. tiare, from Lat. tiara.] A tiara.

tī-ār'-a, tī-a'-ra, s. [Lat., from Gr. tiara, tiaras=the Persian head-dress worn on great occasions. Skeat suggests a derivation from Pers. tājwar=a crown, a diadem.]

1. The head-covering of the ancient Persians; the crown of the ancient Persian kings. These alone had the privilege of wearing the tiara erect; the nobility and priests wore it depressed, or turned down on the fore side. Its form is described variously by different authors, so that it must have varied at different periods. According to Xenophon it was encompassed with the diadem, at least on ceremonial occasions.

2. The triple crown worn by the Pope on certain occasions as a sign of his temporal power, of which it is a badge, as the keys are of his spiritual jurisdiction. The whole history of the Papal Tiara is uncertain. Nicholas I. (858-67) is said to have been the first to unite the princely crown with the miter, Tiara.

a. Example from Khorsabad, showing the Great King of Assyria wearing the tiara. Over the tunic is a cloak of two pieces, fringed, and covered with large rosettes. b. Ancient Persian soldier wearing the tiara.

Group of Thyrsi.

a. From an Egyptian-Roman bas-relief of the time of Emperor Hadrian; b. From a fragment of a sarcophagus, containing in the center a bas-relief of Bacchus with thyrsus and a fawn; c. d. From ancient Bacchanalian vases; e. From bas-relief of Bacchus received by Icarus in the garden of a villa in Athens (a fawn bears the thyrsus behind Bacchus); f. From a bas-relief of the youthful Bacchus, bearing a thyrsus, and accompanied by a fawn.

Successive Forms of the Papal Tiara.

though the Bollandists think this was done before his time. The common statement that Boniface VIII. (about 1300) added the second is incorrect, fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camēl, hēr, thēre; pīne, pīt, sīre, sīr, marīne; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rāle, fūll; trŷ, Sŷrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

for Hefe (Beitrage, ii. 236 sqq.) shows that Innocent III. is represented wearing the second crown in a painting older than the time of Boniface. Urban V. (1362-70) is supposed to have added the third crown. In its present form the tiara consists of a high cap of cloth of gold, encircled by three coronets, and surmounted by a mound and cross of gold; on each side is a pendant, embroidered and fringed at the end, and semé of crosses of gold. The tiara is placed on the Pope's head at his coronation by the second cardinal deacon in the loggia of St. Peter's, with the words: "Receive the tiara adorned with three crowns, and know that thou art Father of princes and kings, Ruler of the World, and Vicar of our Savior Jesus Christ."

- Hence, figuratively used for the papal dignity.
- A crown, a diadem.

"This royal robe, and this tiara, wore Old Priam, and this golden scepter bore."
Dryden: Virgil's Æneid, vii. 337.

tī-ār'-aəd, tī-ar'-aəd, a. [English tiara; -ed.] Adorned with or wearing a tiara.

tī-a-rid'-i-ūm, s. [Mod. Lat. dimin., from tiara (q. v.).]

Botany: A genus of Heliotropæ, akin to Heliotropium, but having the tube of the corolla angular, and two-celled, miter-shaped nuts. Tiaridium indicum is an astringent, and is used to cleanse ulcers or allay inflammation.

tī-ār'-īs, s. [Gr. tiaris, another form of tiara.] [TIARA.]

1. Ornith.: A genus of Fringillidæ with one species, from Brazil. Bill conical, entire; head crested; wings moderate; tail even or slightly rounded; feet moderate.

2. Zoöl.: A genus of Agamidæ, with three species, from the islands of the Eastern Peninsula. Scales of the body keeled, those of the back unequal; eye-brow and parotids unarmed.

tīb, subst. [A contract. or corrupt. of the proper name Tabitha.]

- A low woman, a paramour, a prostitute.

"Every coistrel
That comes inquiring for his tīb."
Shakesp.: Pericles, iv. 6.

- The ace of trumps in the game of glee.

¶ (1) St. Tib's Eve: An expression equivalent to the "Greek Calends"; never. Brewer says that St. Tib's is a corrupted form of St. Ubes, itself a corruption of Setubal. There is no St. Ubes in the calendar.

- (2) Tib of the buttery: A goose. (Gipsy cant.)

(3) To tīb out: To go out of bounds. (School slang.)

"When I was a boy I used what they call to tīb out, and ran down to a public-house in Cistercian Lane, the Red Cow, sir."—Thackeray: Newcomes, ch. xii.

tib-cat, s. A female cat.

tīb'-ērt, *tīb'-ērt, s. [TIB.] An old name for a cat.

Tī-bēt', Thī-bēt' (Th as T), s. [See def.]

Geog.: A region of Central Asia immediately north of the Himalaya Mountains. It is about 1,400 miles from east to west, and 600 from north to south, and is subject to the rule of the Emperor of China.

Tibet-cloth, s.

- A camlet or fabric made of goat's hair.

2. A fine woolen cloth used for making ladies' dresses.

Tibet-dog, Tibet-mastiff, s.

Zoöl.: A variety of Canis familiaris, about the size of a Newfoundland dog, but with a head resembling that of the mastiff, and having the flews large and pendent. The color is usually deep black, with a bright brown spot over each eye; the hair is long, and the tail bushy and well curled. This variety is extremely savage, and has been known from classic times, when it was employed by the Romans, especially under the Emperors, in the games of the circus.

Tī-bēt'-an, Thī-bēt'-an (Th as T), a. & s. [See definition.]

A. As adj.: Of or pertaining to Tibet or Thibet.

B. As substantive:

- A native or inhabitant of Tibet.
- The language of Tibet.

Tibetan sun-bear, s.

Zoöl.: Ursus tibetanus. [SUN-BEAR, 1.]

Tibetan water-shrew, s.

Zoöl.: Nectogale elegans. It is about eight inches long, half of which is occupied by the tail; upper surface slate-gray, lower parts white. It has largely webbed feet, and is the most thoroughly aquatic of all the Soricidæ. [NECTOGALE.]

tīb'-ī-a, s. [Lat.=a pipe, the shin-bone.]

1. Anat.: The shin-bone, with the exception of the femur, the longest bone in the skeleton. It is the anterior and inner of the two bones of the leg, and alone communicates the weight of the trunk to the foot. It is slightly twisted, and articulates with the femur, fibula, and astragalus. Its superior extremity is thick and expanded, with two condylar surfaces supporting the femur, and an external and an internal tuberosity; the shaft is three-sided, the inner surface convex and subcutaneous; the inferior is smaller than the superior extremity, and forms a thick process called the internal malleolus. (Quain.) The tibia corresponds with the radius of the arm.

2. Entom.: The fourth joint of the leg.

3. Music: A kind of pipe, a common musical instrument among the Greeks and Romans. It had holes at proper intervals, and was furnished with a mouthpiece, the performer in blowing putting the end of it to his mouth. Two such pipes were often blown simultaneously by the same performer.

"Cross-flutes were known to the Greeks by the name plagiatulos, and to the Romans as tibia obliqua; both of these terms leave no doubt as to their nature. By the Romans the cross-flute was sometimes called also tibia vasca, the meaning of which is very doubtful. Although the tibiae represented flutes of all kinds, yet if a real tibia or shin-bone be made into a flute, it is held crossways, and the player blows into a hole in the side."—Stainer & Barrett: Dict. Musical Terms.

tīb'-ī-āl, a. [Lat. tibi(a); Eng. adj. suff. -al.]

- Pertaining to the pipe or flute called a tibia.
- Pertaining to the tibia or shin-bone; as, the tibial artery.

tī-bīç'-in-āte, v. i. [Lat. tibicen (genit. tibicinis)=a flute-player.] To play on a tibia or pipe.

tīb'-ī-ō-, prefix. [TIBIA.] Connected with the tibia.

tibio-fibular, a. Of, belonging to, or connected with the tibia and the fibula. There are tibio-fibular articulations.

tibio-tarsal, a.

Anat.: Of or belonging to the tibia and the tarsus. (Dunghison.)

tīc, s. [French=a bad habit, a convulsive movement.]

Pathol.: Neuralgia

tic doloreux, s.

Pathol.: Brow-ague, or prosopalgia, a common form of neuralgia, involving the fifth or trigeminal nerve, usually in its ophthalmic branch. A variety is termed clavus hystericus, from the feeling as of a nail being driven into the parts.

tī-cal', s. [Native name.]

- A Siamese coin, worth about 61 cents; also a weight equal to about 236 grains Troy.

2. A Chinese money of account of the value of about $1.53; also a weight equal to about 4¼ ounces.

tīçe', *tīçe, v. t. [A contract. of entice (q. v.).] To entice, to seduce, to allure.

"What strong enchantments tice my weary soul?"

Marlowe: Tamburlaine, Pt. I., i. 2.

tīçe'-mēnt, s. [A contract. of enticement (q. v.).] The act of enticing; enticement, allurements.

tī-chōd'-rō-ma, subst. [Gr. teichos=a wall, and dromeus=a runner.]

Ornith.: Wall-creeper (q. v.); a genus of Certhiidae, with one species, ranging from South Europe to Abyssinia, Nepaul, and the north of China. Bill slightly curved, nostrils with membranous scale. Wings long and rounded; tail rounded, tip of feathers soft.

tī'-chō-rhine, s. [Mod. Lat. tichorhinus, from Gr. teichos=a wall, and rhis (genit. rhinos)=the nose.]

Palæont.: The English translation of the specific name of the Woolly Rhinoceros (R. tichorhinus), which has reference to the fact that the nostrils are completely separated by a bony septum. [WOOLLY-RHINOCEROS.]

tick (1), s. [A contract. of ticket (q. v.).]

- Credit, trust.

"Play on tick, and lose the Indies, I'll discharge it all to-morrow."—Dryden: Evening's Love, iii.

- A score, an account.

"Paying ready money that the maids might not run tick at the market."—Arbuthnot: John Bull.

Flute-Player with Tibia.

tick (2), *teke (1), *tike, *tique, *tyke, s. [O Dut. teke; Low Ger. teke, tåke; Ger. zäcke, zecke; Ital. zecca; Dut. tcek. From the same root as TAKE (q. v.).]

1. A popular name for any individual of the family Ixodidae (q. v.). They abound in almost all parts of the world, but chiefly in warm countries. Many of them live in woods, on the branches of trees, but ready to attach themselves to animals, which sometimes suffer greatly from their attacks. The quantity of blood drawn from their hosts by these little pests is by no means so inconsiderable as one might imagine from their original size, for their skin is so distensible that the gorged parasite increases to many times its original bulk. Although generally confined to some particular species or group of animals, ticks occasionally attack man. (See extract.)

"Delegorgue speaks of some very small, reddish ticks in Africa, which cover the clothes by thousands, and produce distressing itching. Others are found in different parts of the globe, and twenty-four species have been described."—Van Beneden: Animal Parasites, p. 143.

- Bot.: The same as TICK-BEAN (q. v.).

"There are several varieties of the tick-bean in cultivation, locally known under the following names: Harrow tick, flat tick, Essex tick, and French tick."—Morton: Cyclop. Agriculture.

tick-bean, s.

Bot.: A variety of the common bean, Faba vulgaris, smaller in size. It is used for feeding horses and other animals.

tick-eater, s.

Ornith.: Any individual of the genus Crotophaga (q. v.).

tick-nation, s. A name given in this country to both a district and its inhabitants when infested with ticks; usually in a contemptuous sense.

tick-seed, s.

Bot.: A name common to plants of the genera Coreopsis and Corispermum.

tick (3), *teke (2), *ticke, s. [Low Lat. techa; Lat. thea=a case, from Gr. thēkē=a case to put anything into, from same root as tithēmi=to place; Dut. tijk; O. H. Ger. zeiche.]

- The cover or case for holding the filling of mattresses and beds.

- Ticking (q. v.).

"Like as, for quilts, ticks, and mattresses, the flax of the Cadurci in France had no fellow."—P. Holland: Pliny, bk. xix., ch. i.

tick (4), subst. [TICK (2), v.] A small, distinct noise, such as that of a going watch or clock.

"The leisurely and constant tick of the death-watch."—Ray: Remains, p. 324.

tick-tick, adv. & s.

A. As adv.: With a sound resembling the tick or beat of a watch or clock.

B. As subst.: A tick; a sound made like that by a watch or clock.

tick (5), *tek, s. [Dut. tik=a touch, a pat, a tick; tikken=to pat, to tick; Low German tikk=a light touch with the tip of the finger. A weakened form from the same root as TAKE (q. v.).]

- A slight touch; a tip.

"Tek or lytylle towche. Tactulus."—Prompt Parv.

2. A small mark intended to direct attention to something, or to act as a check.

"To put a tick against the candidate he prefers."—London Daily News.

- A game of boys; also called Tig.

"By moonshine, many a night, do give each other chase, At hood-wink, barley-break, at tick, or prison base."—Drayton: Polyolbion, s. 30.

tick (1), v. i. [TICK (1), s.]

- To buy on tick; to go on trust or credit; to run a score.

"I shall contrive to have a quarter before-hand, and never let family tick more for victuals, cloaths, or rent."—Steele: Correspondence, ii. 477.

- To give tick, credit, or trust.

"The money went to the lawyers; counsel won't tick."—Arbuthnot: Hist. John Bull.

tick (2), v. i. & t. [Of imitative origin.]

A. Intransitive:

- To make a small distinct noise as a going watch or clock; to give out a succession of small sharp noises.

2. To strike with a small, sharp sound, or gently, as a bird when picking up its food.

"Stand not ticking and toying at the branches nor boughs."—Latimer.

B. Trans.: To note or mark as by the ticks or vibrations of a watch or clock.

"I do not suppose that the ancient clocks ticked or noticed the seconds."—Tollet.

tidal-air, s.

Physiol.: The fresh air introduced into the upper part of the lungs by inspiration, as distinguished from the stationary air already in the lungs. The former contains more oxygen and less carbon dioxide than the latter. The tidal-air is so called because when it becomes diffused it parts with some of its oxygen, and takes some carbon dioxide from the stationary air.

tidal-alarm, s. An audible alarm operated by the ebb and flow of the tide. It is placed on a spit or shoal to warn off vessels during fogs, being on a vessel or buoy moored to the spot, or on a post or pile driven into the sand or shingle. It may be a bell, whistle or trumpet, rung or blown by the impact of the passing tidal current.

tidal-basin, s. A dock filled only at high tide.

tidal-boat, s. A steamer which plies between tidal harbors, and whose arrivals and departures are, therefore, regulated by the time of the tide.

tidal-harbor, s. A harbor in which the tide ebbs and flows, as distinguished from a harbor which is kept at high water by means of docks with flood-gates.

tidal-motor, s. An arrangement by which the ebb and flow of the tide is utilized as a source of power to move machinery, &c.

tidal-river, s. A river whose waters rise and fall up to a certain point in its course under the influence of the tide-wave.

tidal-train, s. A railway train running in connection with a steamer, and whose time is, therefore, regulated by the state of the tide.

tidal-valve, s. A valve adapted to sluice-ways, which opens to the pressure of the land water when the tide falls, and closes as the tide rises, to prevent the flooding of the land by sea-water.

tidal-wave, s. [TIDE-WAVE.]

tid'-bit, s. [Eng. tid, and bit.] A dainty, a tit-bit (q. v.).

tide, tyde, s. [A. S. tid=time, hour; cogn. with Dut. tijd; Icel. tidh; Dan. and Sw. tid; O. H. Ger. zit; Ger. zeit; Dut. tij=tide.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Time, season, hour.

"He hath then at all tide
Of loue such maner pride."

Gower: C. A., i.

2. The alternate rise and fall of the water in the ocean, as seen on sea beaches, cliffs, estuaries, &c. When the water rises to the highest point it is capable of reaching on any particular day it is called high tide; when it sinks to the lowest possible ebb, low tide is reached. High tides follow each other at intervals of twelve hours twenty-five minutes, low tides succeed each other at the same interval. The most potent cause in producing the tides is the action of the moon. It is obvious that by the laws of gravitation the moon must attract the water of the ocean on the particular side on which it is itself at the time, and if the earth were immovably fixed, and there were no sun, this would be all. But the earth is not fixed, and in addition to drawing the water to it from the earth on one side of the globe, the moon draws the globe itself away from the water on the other side, thus making high water at the same time on opposite sides of the earth. The sun also exerts an attraction, but owing to his enormous distance it is feeble than that of the moon. When the sun and moon exert their influence in one direction it is the highest tide, called a spring tide; when they counteract each other's attraction it is neap tide. Though to an observer on the land the water seems simply to alternately rise and fall, yet what really takes place on the ocean at large is that the moon raises a wave, which follows her movement, thus producing high water successively at different places as the earth turns upon its axis, if the earth did not revolve, tides would only occur every fourteen days. The energy producing tides is thus mainly that of the earth, not of the moon; the store of earthly energy is therefore reduced by the tides, which act as a break or drag upon the revolving globe, while the energy of the moon is increased by them. The effect is to retard the rotation of the earth and cause the moon slowly to increase her distance from the earth. Tides reaching the shore are affected by its conformation. Thus in a nearly land-locked sea like the Mediterranean they are only from one to three feet. Far out in the ocean they have but a small range; thus at St. Helena they are only three feet, while in London they are eighteen or nineteen feet. At Cardiff there is a rise and fall during spring tides of thirty-seven or thirty-eight feet, and during neap tides of twenty-eight or twenty-nine feet; the greatest tide, that in the Bay of Fundy, is fifty feet.

3. A state of being at the height or in superabundance.

"I have important business
The tide whereof is now."

Shakesp.: Troilus and Cressida, v. 1.

4. A flood, a rush, a torrent.

"The tide of knaves."

Shakesp.: Timon of Athens, iii. 4.

5. A stream, a flow, a current; as, a tide of blood.

6. Course or tendency of causes, influences, or circumstances; regular course or process; natural tendency; course, current; sometimes a favorable conjunction of causes or influences.

"There is a tide in the affairs of men

Which, taken at its flood, leads on to fortune."

Shakesp.: Julius Caesar, iv. 3

7. A violent commotion.

"The tides of people once up, there want not stirring winds to make them more rough."—Bacon: Henry VII.

His boots were polished, his jacket was trim."

Barham: Ingoldsby Legends; The Execution.

(4) A kind of growl or screech after cheering; as, three cheers and a tiger. (U. S. Colloq.)

II. Technically:

1. Zoöl.: Felis tigris (Tigris regalis*, Gray), the largest and most dangerous of the Felidae, exceeding the Lion slightly in size and far surpassing him in destructiveness. It is purely Asiatic in its habitat, but is not by any means confined to the hot plains of India, though there it reaches its highest development both of size and coloration. It is found in the Himalayas at certain seasons, at a high altitude, and in 1887 one was captured near Wladivostok, in Siberia, and another in the Caucasus, near the Black Sea. (Nature, Nov. 10, 1887.) It is met with to the eastward throughout Chinese Tartary, as far north, it is said, as the island of Saghalien, where the winter is very severe. According to Fayrer (Royal Tiger of Bengal, p. 30), the full-grown male Indian tiger is from nine to twelve, and the tigress from eight to ten feet from the nose to the tip of the tail, and from thirty-six to forty-two inches high at the shoulder. It is the only member of the family ornamented with cross stripes on the body—a scarce type of coloration among mammals. These cross stripes help to render the animal inconspicuous among the reeds in which it commonly hides itself, and where it would be seen with comparative ease if marked with spots or longitudinal bands. The ground color of the skin is rufous or tawny yellow, shaded with white on the ventral surface. This is varied with vertical black stripes or elongated ovals and brindlings. On the face and posterior surface of the ears the white markings are peculiarly well developed. The depth of the ground color and the intensity of the black markings vary, according to the age and condition of the animal. In old tigers the ground becomes more tawny, of a lighter shade, and the black markings better defined. The ground coloring is more dusky in young animals. Although possessed of immense strength and ferocity, the tiger rarely attacks an armed man, unless provoked, though often carrying off women and children. When pressed by hunger or enfeebled by age and incapable of dealing with larger prey, like buffaloes, the tiger prowls around villages, and, having once tasted human flesh, becomes a confirmed man-eater (q. v.). In a Government report it is stated that "one tigress caused the desertion of thirteen villages, and 250 square miles of country were thrown out of cultivation." The natives destroy tigers by traps, pitfalls, spring-guns, and poisoned arrows, but the orthodox method of keeping down their numbers as pursued by Europeans is to employ natives to beat the bush while the game, when started, is shot by the sportsmen seated on elephants. The sport is exciting, but dangerous; for a wounded tiger has been known to spring upon an elephant and to inflict serious wounds on the driver and occupants of the howdah, before it could be despatched. When taken young the tiger is capable of being tamed. The pair of adult animals which were presented to the Zoological Society of London by the Guicowar of Baroda, used to be led about by their attendants in the streets of that city; and Sir James Outram once possessed a male which lived at large in his quarters, and occasionally accompanied him in boat excursions. The Tiger was known to the ancients; frequent mention of it occurs in both Greek and Latin writers, and like the Lion, it was habitually seen in the Games of the Circus. No reference is made to it, however, in the Bible. The Jaguar (Felis onca) is sometimes called the American Tiger, and Felis macrocelis, from the Malayan Peninsula, the Clouded Tiger.

2. Sugar: A tank having a perforated bottom, through which the molasses escape.

† To buck (or fight) the tiger: To gamble. (Slang.) tiger-beetles, s. pl.

tiger-lily, s.

Bot.: Lilium tigrinum, a fine lily, having scarlet spotted flowers, whence it is called also the Tiger-spotted Lily. It is a native of China, but is now cultivated in European and American gardens. The bulbs are eaten in China and Japan.

tiger-moth, s.

Entom.: Arctia caja, a large fine moth, the male with pectinated antennæ, the fore wings in both sexes brown, with numerous irregularly ramifying whitish streaks and spots, the hinder wings reddish orange with six or seven blue-black spots; expansion of wings, 2¼ to 2¾ inches. Larva black, with long white hairs on the back, reddish-brown ones along the sides and on the anterior segments; the head and legs black. It feeds on chickweed, dock-nettle, and various low plants. The eggs are deposited in July and August; the larva lives through the winter, and when full grown is about two inches long. It spins a loose hairy web in July, and changes to a large dark smooth chrysalis.

tiger-shark, s.

Ichthy.: Stegostoma tigrinum, a shark common in the Indian Ocean. Young specimens are generally met with close to the shore; but the full-grown fish, from ten to fifteen feet long, frequent the open sea. The color is a yellowish-brown, with black or dark-brown transverse bands or spots, whence the popular name. Called also Zebra-shark.

tiger-shell, tiger-cowry, s.

Zoöl.: Cypræa tigris. The dark markings, however, consist of dots, and not of stripes.

tiger-wolf, s. [THYLACINE.]

"The tigresse commeth and finds her nest and den empty."—P. Holland: Pliny, bk. viii., ch. xviii.

ti-grid'-î-a, s. [Mod. Lat., dim. from Gr. tigris = a tiger; or Gr. tigris = a tiger, and eidōs = appearance. Named from its spotted flowers.]

Bot.: A genus of Iridaceæ. Bulbs from Mexico, with very beautiful but fugitive flowers. [TIGER-FLOWER.]

tî'-grîne, a. [Eng. tiger; -ine.] Like a tiger; tigrish.

"The young of the lion are marked with faint stripes of a tigrine character."—Wood: Illus. Nat. Hist., i. 163.

tî'-gris, s. [Lat.] [TIGER.]

Zool.: A Linnæan genus of Carnivora Felina. It was revived by Gray, in whose classification the Tiger figured as Tigris regalis.

tî'-grîsh, a. [Eng. tiger; -ish.]

1. Resembling, pertaining to, or characteristic of a tiger; fierce, bloodthirsty.

"Let this thought thy tigrish courage pass."
Sydney: Astroph. and Stella.

*2. Swaggering, bullying.

"Nothing could be more vagrant, devil-me-carish, and to use the slang word, tigrish, than his whole air."—Lytton: My Novel, bk. vi., ch. xx.

tî-grî-sô'-mâ, s. [Lat. tigris = a tiger, and Gr. sôma = the body. Named from the markings on the plumage.]

Ornith.: A genus of Ardeidæ, with four species from tropical America and Western Africa. Bill as in Ardea (q.v.); face and sometimes chin, naked; legs feathered almost to the knees; inner toe rather shorter than outer; claws short, stout, regularly curved; anterior scales reticulate or hexagonal.

tike (1), s. [TICK (2), s.]

tike (2), tyke, s. [Icel. tík; Sw. tik = a bitch.]

1. A dog, a cur.

"Or bobtail tike or trundle-tail."
Shakesp.: Lear, iii. 6.

2. A Yorkshireman.

3. A vulgar person, a queer fellow.

tik-el, a. [TICKLE, a.] tî-koôr', tîk'-ûl s. [Bengalee name.]

Bot.: Garcinia pedunculata, a tall tree, a native of Rungpoor, Goalpara, and Sylhet in India. The fruit is large, round, smooth and, when ripe, yellow. The fleshy part is of a very sharp, pleasant taste, and is used by the natives for curries, and for acidulating water; if cut into slices it will keep for years, and might be used, in lieu of limes, on board ship on long voyages. (Calcutta Exhib. Report.)

tîk'-ôr, s. [Native name.]

Botany, &c.:

1. The tubers of Curcuma leucorrhiza, which grow in the forests of Bahar in India. They are yellow inside, and often a foot long.

2. An excellent kind of arrowroot prepared from the tubers.

tî'-kûs, s. [Native name.]

Zoology: A small insectivorous mammal, from Malacca and Sumatra, described by Sir Stamford Raffles as Viverra gymnura, but now known as Gymnurus rafflesii. Externally it is not unlike an opossum with a lengthened muzzle; greater portion of the body, upper part of legs, root of tail, and stripe over the eye black, the other parts white. It possesses glands which secrete a substance with a strong musky smell.

tîl (1), s. [TILL (1), s.]

tîl (2), s. [TILIA.]

tîl (3), s. [See def.]

Comm.: The name given in the Canary Islands to the wood of Oreodaphne exaltata. [OREODAPHNE.] Called also Tilwood.

tîl, prep. [TILL, prep.]

tîl'-bûr-ŷ, tîl-burgh, s. [From the name of the inventor, a London coach-builder, in the early part of the present century.] A gig or two-wheeled carriage without a top or cover.

tîl'-dê, s. [Sp.] The diacritic mark placed over the letter n (sometimes over l) in Spanish to indicate that in pronunciation the following vowel is to be sounded as if a y had been affixed to it; as cañon, pronounced can-yon.

tile (1), tyle, subst. [A contract. of tigel; A. S. tigele, from Lat. tegula = a tile, lit. = that which covers, from tego = to cover.]

1. A kind of thin slab of baked clay, used for covering roofs, paving floors, lining furnaces or ovens, constructing drains, &c. Tiles, both flat and curved, were in great demand in Roman architecture. Roofs were covered with the flat and curved tiles alternating. Tiles two feet square with a foot at each angle were used to line the thermæ, so that an air space between them and the wall should prevent the absorption of the water by the latter. Tiles are manufactured by a similar process to bricks. Roofing tiles are of two sorts, plain tiles and pantiles; the former are flat, and are usually made $\frac{3}{4}$ inch in thickness, $10\frac{1}{2}$ inches long, $6\frac{1}{4}$ wide. They weigh from 2 to $2\frac{1}{2}$ pounds each, and expose about one-half to the weather; 740 tiles cover 100 superficial feet. They are hung upon the lath by two oak pins, inserted into holes made by the molder. Pantiles, first used in Flanders, have a wavy surface, lapping under and being overlapped by adjacent tiles of the same rank. They are made $14\frac{1}{2} \times 10\frac{1}{2}$; expose ten inches to the weather; weigh from 5 to $5\frac{1}{4}$ pounds each; 170 cover 100 superficial feet. Crown, Ridge, Hip, and Valley tiles are semi-cylindrical, or segments of cylinders, used for the purposes indicated. Siding-tiles are used as a substitute for weather boarding. Holes are made in them when molding, and they are secured to the lath by flat-headed nails. The gauge or exposed face is sometimes indented, to represent courses of brick. Fine mortar is introduced between them when they rest upon each other. Siding-tiles are sometimes called Weather-tiles and Mathematical tiles; these names are derived from their exposure or markings. They are variously formed, having curved or crenated edges, and various ornaments either raised or encaustic. Dutch tiles, for chimneys, are made of a whitish earth, glazed and painted with various figures. Drain-tiles are usually made in the form of an arch, and laid upon flat tiles called Soles. Paving tiles are usually square and thicker than those used for roofing. [ENCAUSTIC.] Galvanized iron tiles have been introduced in France. They are shaped like pantiles, so that each laps upon its neighbor in the course, and each course laps upon the one beneath it.

"The houses are represented as considerable, being built with stone and timber, and covered with tiles, a very uncommon fabric for these warm climates and savage countries."—Anson: Voyages, bk. iii., ch. vi.

2. Brass Founding: The cover of a brass furnace. Now made of iron, but formerly a flat tile.

3. Metall.: A clay cover for a melting-pot.

4. A tall stiff hat; a tall silk hat, or one of that shape. (Slang.)

"And down he sat without further bidding, having previously deposited his old white hat on the landing outside the door. 'Ta'nt a werry good 'un to look at,' said Sam, 'but it's an astonishin' 'un to wear; and afore the brim went, it was a werry handsome tile.'"—Dickens: Pickwick, ch. xii.

tile-creasing, s.

Mason.: A row of tile laid along the top of a wall, projecting beyond the face; or each face, if both are exposed. A row of bricks laid header fashion is laid above, and is called a cope. A double row laid so as to break joint is double tile-creasing.

tile-drain, s. A drain made of tiles.

tile-earth, s. A strong clayey earth; stiff, stubborn land.

tile-field, s. Ground on which tiles are made.

tile-kiln, s. A form of kiln adapted to burning tiles.

tile-ore, s.

Min.: An earthy form of cuprite (q. v.), of a brick-red or reddish-brown color; usually impure from admixture of earthy limonite or turgite, and other substances.

tile-pin, s. A pin, usually of hard wood, passing through a hole in a tile into a lath, &c., to secure it to the roof.

Bot.: Geissorhiza; a genus of Iridaceæ, with showy flowers, chiefly from the Cape of Good Hope. Some species are cultivated in greenhouses.

tile-stone, s.

I. Ord. Lang.: A tile.

II. Technically:

1. Geol. (pl.: Certain beds originally considered by Murchison to be the base of the Old Red Sandstone, but afterward transferred by him to the highest part of the Upper Silurian. They have been retained in this position, and are considered to be the transition beds from the Upper Silurian to the Old Red Sandstone. Salter proposed to call them Ledbury shales.

2. Petrol.: A name by which certain slates which cleave along planes of bedding are known. They form roofing slates.

tile-tea, s. A kind of inferior tea prepared by stewing refuse leaves with milk, butter, salt, and herbs, and solidifying the mixture by pressing into moulds. It is sold at Kiachta to the Armenians for distribution through Western Siberia and the Caucasus. It is an article of food rather than a beverage.

tile-work, s. A place where tiles are made; a tilery.

tile (2), s. [Etym. doubtful.] In Freemason and other lodges, the door of the lodge. [TILE (2), v.] till'-ēr-ŷ, s. [Eng. tile (1), s.; -ry.] A place where tiles are made; tile-works.

*tile'-shard, s. [Eng. tile (1), s., and shard.] A piece of broken tile.

"The Greeks after they have well rammed a floor which they mean to pave, lay thereupon a pavement of rubbish, or else broken tiles."—P. Holland: Pliny, bk. xxxvi., ch. xxv.

till'-ēt, s. [TEIL.]

till'-ī-a, s. [Lat. = the lime tree.]

Bot.: Lime or Linden tree; the typical genus of Tiliaceæ (q. v.). Sepals five, petals five, often with a scale at the base. Style simple, stigma five-toothed, ovary five-celled, each cell with two ovules; fruit globose, indehiscent, one-celled, one or two seeded. Known species eight, from the north temperate zone.

till'-ī-ā'-çē-æ, s. pl. [Mod. Latin tili(a) (q. v.); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -eæ.]

Botany: Lindenblossoms; an order of Hypogynous Exogens, alliance Malvales. Trees, shrubs, rarely herbs. Leaves simple, stipulate, toothed, alternate. Flowers axillary; sepals four or five, distinct or united; aestivation valvate; petals four or five; stamens generally indefinite in number; style one; stigmas as many as the carpels, of which the ovary has from two to ten; ovules varying in number; fruit dry or prickly, sometimes winged, with several cells, or with only one; seeds one or many. Chiefly from the Tropics. Tribes Tileæ and Elæocarpeæ; genera thirty-five, species 350 (Lindley); genera forty, species 330 (Hooker).

till'-īng, s. [TILE (1), v.]

1. The operation of covering a roof, &c., with tiles.

2. Tiles on a roof; tiles generally.

"They . . . let him down through the tiling with his couch before Jesus."—Luke v. 19.

tillk'-ēr-ō-dite, subst. [After Tilkerode, Hartz, where first found; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A variety of clausenthalite (q. v.), differing in the proportions of selenium and lead, and containing over 3 per cent. of cobalt. Occurs with other selenium compounds.

till (1), s. [TEEL.]

till (2), *tyll, s. [TILL (1), v.]

1. A drawer.

2. A money-box in a shop, warehouse, &c.; a cash-drawer, as in a shop, counter, or the like; a money-drawer in a counter or desk.

"No shopkeeper's till or stock could be safe."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xix.

till (3), s. [An abbreviation of lentil. (Prior.)]

Bot.: Ervum lens.

till (4), s. [Scotch = a cold, unproductive clay.]

Geol.: The Lower Boulder clay; a stiff, stony, unstratified clay produced by the bottom moraine of a great ice sheet. In Scotland it sometimes exceeds a hundred feet thick. It contains layers of peat and terrestrial vegetation, interglacial beds, the latter with bones of the mammoth and the reindeer, with fragments of the arctic and boreal shells. It proves a submergence of Scotland to 520 feet below its present level. It is of Pleistocene age, and is probably the equivalent of the Lower Shelly Boulder clay of Lancashire.

till, *til, *tille, *tyl, *tyll, *tyle, prep. [Icel. till = till, to; Dan. till; Sw. till.]

1. To. (In this sense still commonly used in Scotland and parts of England and Ireland.)

"Thei fled out of Wales away till Ireland."

Robert de Brunne, p. 3.

"They must purvey for their own food, and either till or famish."—Bp. Hall: Invisible World, bk. i., § 8.

†till'-a-ble, a. [Eng. till (2), v.; -able.] Capable of being tilled; fit for the plow; arable.

till'-læ-a, s. [Named after Tilli, an Italian botanist (1655-1740).]

Bot.: A genus of Crassulæ. Calyx three or four parted or lobed; petals three to five, generally distinct, acuminate. Styles short, carpels three to five, ovules one or more, follicles few or many-seeded, constricted in the middle. Known species twenty, distribution world-wide.

till'-age (age as īg), *tyll-age, s. [Eng. till (2), verb; -age.]

1. The operation, practice, art, or occupation of tilling, or preparing land for crops, keeping the ground free from weeds which might hinder the growth of the crops, and dressing the crops; cultivation, agriculture, culture, husbandry. It includes the operations of manuring, plowing, harrowing, rolling, &c.

"The instruments and tools for tillage and husbandry."—P. Holland: Plutarch, p. 111.

2. A place tilled or cultivated.

till'-lānd'-sī-a, s. [Named by Linnæus after a professor at Abo, who, encountering a storm at sea, vowed never again to travel by water, and exchanged his original name for Tillands = on or by land.]

Bot.: A genus of Bromeliaceæ. Calyx persistent, divided into three oblong segments, lanceolate at the tip; corolla tubular, longer than the calyx, also divided into three segments; stamens six, with short filaments; ovary superior; stigma obtuse, trifid; fruit a capsule, having three cells with several seeds, each supported by a long stalk of aggregate fibers, which at last becomes a feathery wing. Known species about thirty. Tillandsia usneoides hangs down from the trees in Tropical America like long, dry beards. It is used for stuffing birds and in the preparation of an ointment used against hæmorrhoids. T. utriculata, the Wild Pine of Jamaica, is another parasite. The stem is three or four feet and the leaves three feet long, with expanded bases, which retain any rain falling upon them; the bases then swell and form a bottle, contracted at the neck, and holding about a quart of water, of which animals and travelers make use during drought. T. monostachya, the Single-spiked Tillandsia, also has reservoirs of water.

till'-ēr (1), *til-i-er, *tyl-i-er, subst. [English till (2), v.; -er.] One who tills or cultivates land; a husbandman, a farmer.

"The lofty site, by Nature framed, to tempt,

Amid a wilderness of rocks and stones,

The tiller's hand."

Wordsworth: Excursion, bk. v.

till'-ēr (2), s. [Eng. till (1), v.; -er.]

I. Ordinary Language:

*1. One who draws.

4. A transverse handle at the upper end of a pit saw.

5. The handle of a cross-bow.

*6. A cross-bow.

II. Naut.: The lever on the head of a rudder, by which the latter is turned.

tiller-chain, s.

Naut.: One of the chains leading from the tiller-head round the barrel of the wheel, by which the vessel is steered.

tiller-head, s.

Naut.: The extremity of the tiller, to which the tiller-rope or chain is attached.

tiller-rope, s.

Naut.: A rope connecting the head of the tiller with the drum of the steering-wheel.

tiller-wheel, s. More properly termed steering-wheel, as it does not always act upon the rudder through the intervention of a tiller, which is a bar or lever projecting from the rudder-head or rudder-post. Sometimes called a Pilot-wheel.

till'-ēr (3), s. [Etym. doubtful.] The shoot of a plant springing from the root or bottom of the original stalk; applied also to a sapling or sucker.

"This they usually make of a curved tiller."—Evelyn: Sylva, bk. iii., ch. iv., § 29.

till'-ēr, v. i. [TILLER (3), s.] To put forth new shoots from the root or round the bottom of the original stalk.

"The wheat plant very much dislikes root crowding, and the object should be to ensure autumn tillering, after which thick, heavy, spear-like stalks usually become developed in the ensuing spring and summer."—London Daily Telegraph.

*till'-lēt, s. [TILET.] The linden-tree.

"The thin barks of the Linden or Tillet tree."—P. Holland: Pliny, bk. xix., ch. ii.

till'-lē-ti-a (ti as shī), s. [Named after Tillet, a Frenchman, who wrote on the diseases of wheat.]

Bot.: A genus of Coniomycetous Fungals. Spores perfectly globose, with a cellular outer coat. Tilletia caries constitutes Bunt (q. v.).

till'-eŷ, s. [TILLY.]

till'-ī-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. till(us); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Entom.: A family of Serricornes. Two at least of the palpi advanced and terminating in a knob; antennæ various; body usually almost cylindrical, with the head and thorax narrower than the abdomen. Chief genera, Tillus and Clerus. Called by Latreille, Clerii.

till'-lie-wāl-lie, s. [TILLYFALLY.]

*till'-man, *tyll-man, s. [Eng. till (2), v., and man.] One who tills the earth; a husbandman.

"Good shepherd, good tillman, good Jack, and good Gill Makes husband and huswife their coffer to fill."

Tusser: Husbandry.

till'-lō-dōn'-ti-a (ti as shī), s. pl. [Gr. tillō = to pluck, to tear, and odontos (genit. odontos) = a tooth.]

Palæont.: A group of fossil Mammals founded by Marsh on remains from the Middle and Lower Eocene of North America. They seem to combine the characters of the Ungulata, Rodentia, and Carnivora.

till'-lōt, s. [Etym. doubtful.] A bale or bundle. (Simmonds.)

till'-lō-thēr'-ī-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Latin, tillother(ium); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Palæont.: A family of Tillodontia, having molar teeth with distinct roots.

till'-lō-thēr'-ī-ūm, s. [Gr. tillō = to pluck, and thērion = a wild beast.]

Palæont.: A genus of Tillodontia (q. v.). The skull was like that of the Ursidæ, the molars were like that of the Ungulata, and the large incisors very similar to those of the Rodentia. The skeleton resembled that of the Carnivora, but the feet were plantigrade, each with five digits, all armed with long, pointed claws.

till'-lōw, v. i. [TILLER, v.]

till'-lūs, s. [Gr. tillō = to pluck.]

Entom.: The typical genus of Tillidæ. Antennæ gradually enlarging toward the apex, all the palpi terminating in a securiform joint.

till'-lŷ (1), a. [Eng. till (4), s.; -y.] Having the character of till or clayey earth.

"The soil of the parish of Holywood is of four different kinds; one of which is a deep strong loam, interspersed with stones, upon a tilly bed."—Sinclair: Scotland.

bōil, bōy; pōut, jōwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, aș; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f. -cian, -tian = șan. -tion, -sion = șun. -tious, -cious, -sious = șus. -ble, -dle, &c. = bel, del.

tīl'-lŷ (2), a. [Etym. unknown.] Presenting no difficulty; easy of accomplishment. (U. S. Colloq.)
tīl'-lŷ, s. [Etym. doubtful.]

Bot.: The seed of Croton Pavana. It is used in India as a purgative.

tīl'-lŷ-fāl-lŷ, tīl'-lŷ-vāl-lŷ, interjec. [A word of no derivation.] An interjection or exclamation used when anything said was rejected as trifling or impertinent.

tilt-roof, s. A round-topped roof, shaped like a tilt or wagon-cover.

tīlt (2), s. [TILT, v.]

I. Ordinary Language:

*1. A thrust.

"His majesty seldom dismissed the foreigner till he had entertained him with the slaughter of two or three of his liege subjects, whom he very dexterously put to death with the tilt of his lance."—Addison: Freeholder.

2. A military exercise on horseback, in which the combatants attacked each other with lances.

"The second tilt they together rode,
They proved their manhood best."

Longfellow: The Elected Knight.

3. A tilt-hammer (q. v.).

4. Inclination forward; as, the tilt of a cask.

II. Geol.: An upheaval of the strata to a high angle of elevation; the strata thus upheaved.

† Full tilt: With full force directly against anything.

"The beast comes full-tilt at the canoe."—Dampier: Voyages (an. 1676).

tilt-hammer, subst. A large hammer worked by steam or waterpower, and used principally in compacting the balls of iron as they come from the puddling-furnace, and driving out the dross with which the iron is associated when in the form of Tilt-hammer.

pig, and some of which is removed by the reverberating flames of the furnace. It is also used in heavy forging. The ordinary tilt-hammer has a cast-iron helve a, supported at the end b on plumb-blocks, fixed upon wooden beams to ease the jar. The head c, of wrought-iron faced with steel, passes through an eye in the helve, and is secured by a key. The base of the anvil is of cast-iron, and the pane d of wrought-iron, faced with steel. The head is raised by a series of cams upon a cast-iron collar e, called the cam-ring bag, fixed on the shaft f, which is provided with a heavy fly-wheel. The hammer has usually a drop of 16 to 24 inches, and strikes 75 to 100 blows per minute. When not in use it is propped up by the support g. The power is applied and regulated by the use of a foot-treadle running around the bed of the hammer in such a manner that the operator can stand in front or on either side.

tilt-mill, s. A building where a tilt-hammer is used.

tilt-steel, s. Forged or hammered steel.

tilt-yard, s. A place for tilting; lists for tilting.

"Sir Artigale into the tilt-yard came."

Spenser: F. Q., V. iii. 10.

tilt, tylte, v. i. & t. [A. S. tealt=unsteady, tottering; tyltan=to totter; cogn. with Icel. tölta=to amble as a horse; Sw. tulta=to waddle; Ger. zelt=an ambling pace; zelter=a palfrey.]

*1. To totter, to fall.

"This ilk toun schal tylte to grounde."

Allit. Poems, 361.

*2. To toss about, to ride or float.

"The floating vessel . . .
Rode tilting o'er the waves."

Milton: P. L., xi. 747.

3. To run or ride and thrust with a lance; to joust, as in a tournament.

4. To fight; to thrust in general.

"Swords out and tilting one at other's breast."

Shakesp.: Othello, ii. 3.

5. To lean or be inclined forward; to rise or fall into a slanting position; to fall as on one side. (Frequently with up.)

"As the trunk of the body is kept from tilting forward by the muscles of the back, so from falling backward by those of the belly."—Grew: Cosmologia.

B. Transitive:

*1. To thrust a weapon at.

"He should tilt her."

Beaum. & Flet.: Woman's Prize, iii. 3.

*2. To point or thrust, as a weapon.

"Now horrid slaughter reigns:

Sons against fathers tilt the fatal lance, Careless of duty."

Philips. (Todd.)

3. To incline; to raise one end of, as of a cask, for the purpose of discharging the liquor. (Frequently with up.)

4. To hammer or forge with a tilt or tilt-hammer; as, to tilt steel.

† To tilt up:

Geology: To throw up suddenly or abruptly at a high angle of inclination; as, The strata were tilted up. The upheaval has often led to the fracture and dislocation of the beds thus elevated.

tilt'-ēd, pa. par. or a. [TILT, v.] tilted-steel, s. Blistered steel heated in a furnace and subjected to the action of a tilt-hammer, which strikes about 100 blows per minute, and increases the solidity and tenacity of the metal.

tilt'-ēr, s. [Eng. -tilt, v.; -er.]

1. One who tilts or jousts.

"Many a bold tilter, who missed the mark with the spear-point, had his head dashed against it in his blundering career."—Knight: Pictorial Hist. Eng., ii. 876.

2. One who tilts or inclines anything.

3. One who hammers with a tilt or tilt-hammer.

tilth, s. [A. S. tildh.]

1. The act or operation of tilling or preparing the ground for a crop; tillage, husbandry.

"Her plenteous womb Expressed its full tilth and husbandry."

Shakesp.: Measure for Measure, i. 4.

2. The state or condition of being tilled or prepared for a crop.

"The lands should be reduced to a fine tilth."—Smithson: Useful Book for Farmers, p. 12.

*3. That which is tilled; tillage ground.

"O'er the rough tilth he cast his eyes around,
And soon the plow of adamant he found."

Fawkes: Apollonius Rhodius; Argon., iv.

4. The degree or depth of soil turned by the plow or spade; that available soil on the earth's surface which the roots of crops strike.

tilt'-lŷng, pr. par. or a. [TILT, v.] tilting-fillet, s. [ARRIS-FILLET.]

tilting-helmet, subst. A large helmet sometimes worn over the other at tournaments.

tilting-spear, s. A spear used in tournaments.

tīl'-ture, s. [Formed from till, v., on a supposed analogy with culture.] The act or process of tilling land; tillage.

"Good tilth brings seedes, Euill tilture weedes."

Tusser: Husbandry; March's Abstract.

tīl'-wood, s. [TIL (3).]

tīm'-a-čite, subst. [From Lat. Timacum minus=Gamzigrad, Servia; suff. -ite (Petrol.).]

Petrol.: A name given by Breithaupt to a felsitic rock inclosing crystals of white felspar, &c. Now shown to belong to the andesites (q. v.), some being quartz-free, and others grouping with the Quartz-andesites.

tī-mā'-lī-a, s. [Etym. doubtful.]

Ornith.: The type-genus of Timaliinae (q. v.), with twelve species from the Malay Peninsula, Sumatra, Borneo, and Java. Bill with sides much compressed to tip; few short bristles at base; nostrils in small groove, semilunar opening with a small scale; wings fifth to seventh quills longest; tarsi with one long scale in front.

tīm'-a-lī'-i-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. timali(a); Lat. fem. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Ornith.: Babbling Thrushes; a group of small, strong-legged, active Passerine birds, mostly of dull colors, which are especially characteristic of the Oriental region, in every part of which they abound, while they are much less plentiful in Australia and Africa. The Indo-Chinese sub-region is the headquarters of the family, whence it diminishes rapidly in all directions in variety of both generic and specific forms. Wallace puts the genera at thirty-five and the species at 240. Other writers extend the limits of the family, which they place under the Turdiformes (q. v.), making the chief characteristic a rounded and concave wing, and divide it into the following sub-families: Troglodytinæ, Brachypodinae, Timaliinae, Cisticolinae, and Miminae.

tī-māl'-ī-i-næ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. timali(a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -inæ.]

Ornith.: A sub-family of Timaliidae (q. v.), approximately equivalent to the family Timaliidae as first described above. Bill moderate, keel curved; nostrils exposed; wings short and rounded; tail graduated; tarsi long and strong; toes long, strong, with large scales above; claws compressed and sharp.

tīm-ar'-ča, s. [Gr. timarchia=honor, respect.]

Entomology: A genus of Chrysomelidae, akin to Chrysomela, but without wings, and having the elytra joined.

tī-ma'-rī-ōt, s. [Turk.] (See extract.)

"Those who, by a kind of feudal tenure, possess land on condition of service, are called Timariots; they serve as Spahis, according to the extent of territory, and bring a certain number into the field, generally cavalry."—Byron: Bride of Abydos. (Note.)

tīm'-bāl, s. [TYMBAL.]

tīm'-bēr (1), tīm-bre, tym-ber, s. & a. [A. S. timber=stuff or material to build with; cogn. with Dut. timmer=timber or structure; Icel. timbr; Dan. tømmer; Sw. timmer; Ger. zimmer=a room, timber; Goth. timrjan=to build; timrja=a huilder; Icel. timbra=to build; Dan. tømre; Ger. zimmer; A. S. timbrian=to build. From the same root as Gr. domō=to build; Eng. dome, domicile, domestic, &c.; Lat. domus=a house. The b is excrement, as in number.]

A. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Trees cut down, squared, or capable of being squared, into beams, rafters, boards, planks, &c., to be employed in the construction of houses, ships, &c., or in carpentry, joinery, &c. [BATTEN, BEAM, BOARD, DEAL, POST, RAFTER, &c.] Timber is usually sold by the load. A load of rough or unhewn timber is forty cubic feet, and a load of squared timber fifty cubic feet, estimated to weigh twenty cwt. In the case of planks, deals, &c., the load consists of so many square feet. Thus, a load of one-inch plank is 600 square feet, a load of planks thicker than one inch equals 600 square feet divided by the thickness in inches. The term is often used for all kinds of felled and seasoned wood.

2. A general term for growing trees yielding wood suitable for constructive purposes. The chief are fir, pine, oak, ash, elm, beech, sycamore, walnut, chestnut, mahogany, teak, &c.

"Okes there are as faire, straight, tall, and as good timber as any can be, and also greast store."—Hackluyt: Voyages, iii. 275.

3. Sometimes applied to growing trees generally; woods.

"The lack of timber is the most serious drawback of the whole region."—Century Magazine, Aug., 1882, p. 507.

4. A piece of wood for building, or already framed; one of the main beams of a building.

"Timbers and planks . . . were all prepared."—Anson: Voyages, bk. iii., ch. iii.

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camel, hēr, thēre; pine, pīt, sīre, sīr, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rāle, fūll; trŷ, Sŷrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

*5. The materials for any structure. (Used also figuratively, as in the example.)

"Such dispositions are the very errors of human nature; and yet they are the fittest timber to make politics of, like to knee timber that is good for ships to be tossed, but not for houses that shall stand firm."—Bacon.

6. The body, stem, or trunk of a tree.

"We take
From every tree lop, bark, and part o' the timber."
Shakesp.: Henry VIII., i. 2.

7. A leg. (Naut. slang.)

II. Technically:

1. Mining: Planks set to support the roof and sides of a gallery or drift. A set of timbers consists of the cap or head-piece, two uprights, legs, or stanchions, and the sleeper or sill.

2. Shipbuild.: One of the curved frames which form the ribs of a ship. They are built up of several pieces. The floor-timbers are between the keel and keelson, and the outward and upward extension-pieces are futtocks, first, second, third, &c. The portious extending above the deck-level are the top-timbers. (Usually in the plural.)

B. As adj.: Made or constructed of wood; as, a timber house, timber work.

¶ Timbers in the head:

Shipbuild.: Pieces of timber with one end bearing on the upper cheeks, and the other extended to the main rail of the head.

timber-and-room, s.

Shipbuild.: The width of a timber and a space. Also called room-and-space, or berth-and-space.

timber-brick, s. A piece of timber, of the size and shape of a brick, inserted in brickwork to attach the finishings to.

timber-frame, s. The same as GANG-SAW (q. v.)

timber-head, s.

Shipbuild.: So much of a frame-timber as rises above the deck.

timber-heels, s. A blundering, loutish fellow, awkward in walking.

timber-hitch, s.

Naut.: The end of a rope taken round a spar, led under and over the standing part, and passed two or three turns round its own part, making a jamming-eye.

timber-lode, s.

Law: A service by which tenants formerly were bound to carry felled timber from the woods to the lord's house.

timber-man, s.

Mining: The man employed in placing supports of timber in the mine.

timber-mare, subst. A sort of wooden horse on which soldiers were made to ride as a punishment.

timber-measure, s. [TIMBER, s., A. I. 1.]

timber-merchant, s. A dealer in timber.

timber-scribe, s. A race-knife (q. v.).

timber-sow, s. A worm in wood; a wood-louse. "Divers creatures, though they be loathsome to take, are of this kind; as earth-worms, timber-sows, snails."—Bacon.

timber-toe, s. A ludicrous term for a wooden leg or a person with a wooden leg. Used also in England for a person wearing clogs.

timber-trade, s. Commerce in timber.

timber-tree, subst. A tree yielding wood fit for building purposes.

timber-wain, s. A timber wagon.

"Downward the ponderous timber-wain resounds."
Wordsworth: Evening Walk.

timber-work, *timber-worke, s. Work constructed of wood; woodwork.

"The stone work withstandeth the fier, and the timber-work the battell ram."—Goldinge: Caesar, fol. 191.

timber-worm, s. Probably the larva of a beetle which bores into and feeds on timber.

timber-yard, s. A yard or place where timber is stored.

tīm'-bēr (2), s. [Fr. timbre; Sw. timber; Low Ger. timmer; Ger. zimmer=a certain number of skins. Remote etym. doubtful.] An old mercantile term, used in England and Scotland to denote a certain number of skins, in the case of the skins of martens, ermine, sables, and the like, 40; of other skins, 130.

"Having presented them with two timber of sables."—Beylin: Reformation, ii. 102.

tīm'-bēr (3), s. [Fr. timbre=a crest, a helmet.]

Heraldry:

1. A row or rank of ermine in a nobleman's coat.
2. The helmet, miter, coronet, &c., when placed over the arms in a complete achievement.

tīm'-bēr (1), *tīm-bre, v. t. & i. [TIMBER (1), s.]

A. Trans.: To furnish or construct with timber; to support with timber.

"The sides of this road, it was said, were not sufficiently timbered."—London Daily Chronicle.

*B. Intrans.: To take to a tree; to settle or build on a tree.

"The one took up in a thicket of brushwood, and the other timbered upon a tree hard by."—L'Estrange.

tīm'-bēr (2), v. t. [TIMBER (3), s.] To surmount, to decorate, as a crest does a coat of arms.

"A purple plume timbers his stately crest."

Sylvester.

tīm'-bēred, *tīm-bred, a. [Eng. timber (1), s.; -ed.]

I. Literally:

1. Furnished or constructed with timbers.

"A low timbered house where the governor abides all the daytime."—Dampier: Voyages (an. 1688).

2. Covered or abounding with growing timber; wooded; as, The country is well timbered.

*II. Figuratively:

1. Built, framed, shaped, formed.

"I think, Hector was not so clean timbered."

Shakesp.: Love's Labor's Lost, v. 2.

2. Massive; like timber.

"His timbered bones all broken rudely rumbled."

Spenser: F. Q., V. ii. 50.

tīm'-bēr-ēr, s. [Eng. timber, s.; -er.] A timber-man.

timberer's ax, s.

Mining: An ax or hatchet used in chopping to length, and notching the timbers which support the roof and sides of the gallery or drift.

tīm'-bēr-līng, s. [English: timber (1), s.; dimin. suff. -ling.] A small timber-tree. (Prov.)

tīm-bes-tere, *tym-bes-tere, subst. [English timb(ri); fem. suff. -ster.] A woman who played on the timbrel or tambourine, to the music of which she danced. They often went about in bands or companies.

"A troop of timbrel-girls (or tymbesteres, as they were popularly called)."—Lytton: Last of the Barons, ch. ii.

tīm-bour-ine, s. [TAMBOURINE.]

tīm-bre (1), s. [TIMBER (1), s.]

tīm-bre (2), s. [Fr.] The same as TIMBER (2), s. (q. v.).

tīm'-bre (bre as bēr) (3), s. [Fr.]

Her.: The crest which in any achievement stands on the top of the helmet.

tīm'-bre (bre as bēr) (4), tym-bre, s. [French, from Lat. tympānum=a drum.] [TIMBREL.]

Music:

*1. A timbrel (q. v.).

"Where as she passeth by the streete,
There was ful many a tymbre beat,
And many a maide carolende."

Gower: C. A., vi.

2. The quality of tone distinguishing voices, instruments, and stops, irrespective of pitch or intensity. All the notes of a given stop of an organ have of necessity the same timbre, but in pitch they range throughout the extent of the chromatic scale. Corresponding notes of stops pitched in unison, such as the open diapason, dulciana, trumpet, bassoon, cremona, vox humana, have the same pitch, but each differs from the others in timbre; the quality of the tone is different. This difference is attained in various ways. Some of the pipes have wooden mouth-pieces, others metallic mouth-pieces, reed pipes, reeds of varying qualities, tubes of varying proportions and shapes, to imitate the peculiar sounds of the various instruments after which they are named, as flute, trumpet, bassoon, oboe, &c.

tīm'-brēl, *tīm'-brēll, *tym-brel, *tym-byre, s. [A dimin. from Mid. Eng. timbre, from Fr. timbre; O. Fr. tymbre=a timbrel, from Lat. tympānum=a drum, from Gr. tympānon=a kettledrum.] [TYMPANUM.]

Music: An instrument of music; a kind of drum, tabor, or tambourine. It has been in use from the earliest times (Exod. xv. 20). It is now known as a tambourine.

"Field, town, and city with his name do ring;

The tender virgins to their timbrels sing

Ditties of him." Drayton: David and Goliath.

timbrel-girl, s. A tymbestere (q. v.).

"She saw . . . the hateful timbrel-girls, followed by the rabble, and weaving their strange dances toward the spot."—Lytton: Last of the Barons, ch. iii.

tīm'-brēlled, tīm'-brēled, a. [Eng. timbrel; -ed.] Sung to the accompaniment of the timbrel.

"In vain with timbreled anthems dark

The sable-stoled sorcerers bear his worshipt ark."

Milton: On the Nativity.

tīm-brōl'-ō-ğy, s. [Fr. timbre=a stamp; Eng. suff. -ology.] The science or study of postage-stamps.

tīm-brōph'-ī-l'y, s. [Fr. timbre=a stamp, and Gr. phileō=to love.] The same as PHILATELY (q. v.).

"It is possibly a question whether the science should properly be called philately or timbrophily. It is, we believe, also styled in some English works timbrology."—Athenæum, Oct. 1, 1881, p. 431.

tīm-bū-rīne', a. [TAMBOURINE.]

time (1), *tyme, s. [A. S. tīma=time; cogn. with Icel. tími; Dan. time; Sw. timme=an hour. From the same root as tide (q. v.).]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The general idea of successive existence; measure of duration. It is absolute or relative. Absolute time is considered without any relation to bodies or their motions. It is conceived by us as unbounded, continuous, homogeneous, unchangeable in the order of its parts and divisible without end. Relative time is the sensible measure of any portion of duration, often marked by particular phenomena, as the apparent revolution of the celestial bodies, the rotation of the earth on its axis, &c. Relative time is divided into years, months, weeks, days, hours, minutes, seconds, and measured by instruments constructed for the purposes, as clocks, watches, chronometers, clepsydras, sun-dials, hour-glasses, &c., the first three being those commonly employed. Time is often personified as an old man, winged and bearing a scythe.

"Our conception of time originates in that of motion; and particularly in those regular and equable motions carried on in the heavens, the parts of which, from their perfect similarity to each other, are correct measures of the continuous and successive quantity called Time, with which they are conceived to co-exist. Time therefore may be defined, The perceived number of successive movements."—Gillies: Aristotle's Ethics; Analysis, ch. ii.

2. A particular portion or part of duration, whether past, present, or future, and considered either as a space or as a point, a period as well as a moment; season, moment, occasion.

"At that time I made her weep."

Shakesp.: Two Gentlemen, iv. 4.

3. An age; a part of duration distinct from other parts; the period at which any definite event occurred or person lived; as, This happened in the time of Moses.

¶ The time: The present age or period.

"The time is out of joint."—Shakesp.: Hamlet, i. 5.

4. A proper occasion or season for anything; hence, an opportunity.

"But an adversary of no common prowess was watching his time."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. iv.

5. Life or duration of life regarded as employed or destined to employment; the allotted period of life.

"I like this place,

And willingly would waste my time in it."

Shakesp.: As You Like It, ii. 4.

6. The present life; existence or duration of a being in this world.

7. All time, the future, eternity.

"To keep your name living to time."

Shakesp.: Coriolanus, v. 3.

8. The state of things at a particular moment or season; prevailing state of circumstances; circumstances. (Generally in the plural, and often with an adjective, as good times, hard times, &c.)

"The spacious times of great Elizabeth."

Tennyson: Dream of Fair Women, 7.

9. Performance or occurrence of an action or event with reference to repetition; hence, simply used by way of multiplication.

"Ay me, she cries, and twenty times Woe, woe."

Shakesp.: Venus and Adonis, 883.

10. Leisure; sufficient time or opportunity.

"Little time for idle questioners."

Tennyson: Enid, 272.

*11. Duration of a being; age, years.

"A youth of greater time than I shall show to be."

Shakesp.: Two Gentlemen, ii. 7.

12. Hour of death, period of travail or the like. (Luke i. 57.)

13. One of the three dramatic unities formerly considered essential in the classical drama. The Unity in time consisted in keeping the period embraced in the action of the piece within the limit of twenty-four hours. [UNITY.]

II. Technically:

1. Gram.: The same as TENSE, s. (q. v.).

2. Music:

(1) The relative duration of a sound (or rest) as measured by the rhythmical proportions of the different notes, taking the semibreve as the unit or standard: the minim being half the semibreve; the crotchet half the minim; the quaver half the crotchet, and so on.

bōl, bōy; pōut, jōw1; cat, çell, chorus,
-cian, -tian = shān. -tion, -sion = shūn;

çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, as; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f.
-tion, -sion = zhūn. -tious, -cious, -sious = shūs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bēl, dēl

(2) The division of musical phrases into certain regulated portions measured with regard to the value of the notes with respect to the semibreve, which, in modern music, is held to be the standard of time. There are also two sorts of time: duple, with two, four, or eight beats in the bar; and triple, with three beats in a bar. There is also compound time, or time formed of the union of triple with duple, and triple with triple, each having a distinctive time signature.

(3) The absolute velocity or pace at which a movement is performed, as indicated by the directions, quick, slow, presto, grave, lento, allegro, &c.

3. Phrenol.: One of the perceptive faculties, the organ of which is divided into two portions, one placed above the middle of each eyebrow. It is supposed to enable one to conceive the duration of events or phenomena, and their simultaneous or successive occurrence.

¶ Time is the generic term; it is either taken for the whole or the part. We speak of time when the simple idea of time only is to be expressed, as the time of the day, or the time of the year. The date is that period of time which is reckoned from the date or commencement of a thing to the time that it is spoken of; hence, we speak of a thing as being of a long or a short date. Era and epoch both refer to points of time rendered remarkable by events; but the former is more commonly employed in the literal sense for points of computation in chronology, as the Christian era; the latter is indefinitely employed for any period distinguished by remarkable events; the war of the rebellion is an epoch in the history of the United States.

¶ 1. Absolute time: Time irrespective of local standards; time everywhere reckoned from one standard.

2. Apparent time, Solar time: Time as reckoned by the movements of the sun; time as shown by a sundial.

3. Astronomical time: Mean solar time, reckoned by counting the hours continuously from one to twenty-four, instead of dividing them into two twelves.

4. At times: At distant intervals of duration.

"The Spirit of the Lord began to move him at times."—Judges xiii. 25.

5. Civil time: Time as reckoned for the purposes of civil or of ordinary life. In most civilized countries the division of civil time is into years, months, weeks, days, hours, minutes, and seconds, besides vaguer designations, such as morning, noon, evening, night, &c.

6. Common time:

(1) Mil.: The ordinary time taken in marching, being about ninety paces per minute, as distinguished from quick time, in which 110 paces are taken.

(2) Mus.: [COMMON-TIME.]

7. Equation of time: [EQUATION.]

8. Greenwich time: Time as settled by the passage of the sun's center over the meridian of Greenwich.

9. In good time:

(1) At the right moment; in good season.

"To jest in good time."

Shakesp.: Comedy of Errors, ii. 2.

(2) Fortunately, happily. (Often used ironically.)

"In good time here comes the noble duke."

Shakesp.: Richard III., ii.

10. In time:

(1) At the right moment; before it is too late.

"Gentle physic given in time had cured me."

Shakesp.: Henry VIII., iv. 2.

(2) In course of time; in the course of things; by degrees; eventually; as, He got well in time.

11. Local time: Time determined by the moment at which the sun comes to the meridian at any particular place.

"Primarily, for the convenience of the railroads, a standard of time was established by mutual agreement in 1883, by which trains are run and local time regulated. According to this system, the United States, extending from 65° to 125° west longitude, is divided into four time sections, each of 15° of longitude, exactly equivalent to one hour. The first (eastern) section includes all territory between the Atlantic coast and an irregular line drawn from Detroit to Charleston, S. C., the latter being its most southern point. The second (central) section includes all the territory between the last-named line and an irregular line from Bismarck, N. D., to the mouth of the Rio Grande. The third (mountain) section includes all territory between the last-named line and nearly the western borders of Idaho, Utah, and Arizona. The fourth (Pacific) section covers the rest of the country to the Pacific coast. Standard time is uniform inside each of these sections, and the time of each section differs from that next to it by exactly one hour. Thus at 12 noon in New York City (eastern time), the time at Chicago (central time) is 11 o'clock A. M.; at Denver (mountain time), 10 o'clock A. M.; and at San Francisco (Pacific time), 9 o'clock A. M. Standard time is 16 minutes slower at Boston than true local time, 4 minutes slower at New York, 8 minutes faster at Washington, 19 minutes faster at Charleston, 28 minutes slower at Detroit, 18 minutes faster at Kansas City, 10 minutes slower at Chicago, 1 minute faster at St. Louis, 28 minutes faster at Salt Lake City, and 10 minutes faster at San Francisco."—N. Y. World Almanac (1894.)

12. Mean time, Mean solar time: [MEAN-TIME.]

13. Nick of time: The exact moment in point of time required by necessity or convenience; the critical moment.

14. Railway time: Time, to which all railway clocks are adjusted. [LOCAL TIME.]

15. Sidereal time: [SIDEREAL-TIME.]

16. Solar time: [¶ 2.]

17. Time about: Alternately.

18. Time enough: In season; soon enough.

"Stanley at Bosworth-field, though he came time enough to save his life, yet he stayed long enough to endanger it."—Bacon: Henry VII.

19. Time of day:

(1) A greeting or salutation appropriate to the hour of the day, as Good morning, Good evening, &c.

"When every one will give the time of day."

Shakesp.: Henry VI., Pt. II., iii. 1.

(2) The latest aspect of affairs; a dodge. (Slang.)

*20. Time of grace: Time during which hunting could be lawfully carried on.

21. Time out of mind, Time immemorial:

Law: Time beyond legal memory; that is, the time prior to the reign of Richard I., A. D. 1189.

22. To beat time: [BEAT, v., C. 16.]

23. To move, run, or go against time: To move, run, or go, as a horse, a runner, &c., as fast as possible, so as to ascertain the greatest speed attainable, or the greatest distance that can be passed over in a certain time.

24. To kill time: To beguile time; to occupy one's self so as to cause the time to pass pleasantly or without tediousness.

25. To lose time:

(1) To fail by delay to take full advantage of the opportunity afforded by the conjuncture; to delay.

"The earl lost no time, but marched day and night."—Clarendon.

(2) To go too slow; as, A watch or clock loses time.

26. True time:

(1) Ord. Lang.: Mean time as kept by a good clock.

(2) Astron.: Apparent time as reckoned from the transit of the sun's center over the meridian.

¶ Time is used in many compounds, the meanings of which are for the most part self-explanatory; as, time-battered, time-enduring, time-worn, &c.

time-ball, s. A ball on a pole, dropped by electricity at a prescribed instant of time (usually 12 m.); an electric time-ball. It is used especially in maritime cities to give time to the officers of ships in port.

¶ A time-ball service was successfully established on the top of the Masonic Temple building, at Chicago, in 1893 under the superintendence of the United States Navy Department. The time of all observatory clocks in the city is supposed to correspond with the instrument in the hydrographic office, being received from the same place. The ball is four feet six inches in diameter and is dropped from the top of a galvanized hollow steel mast, thirty feet above the dome of the building and 332 feet above the ground. The ball can be seen with a glass at a distance of ten miles. The ball is dropped precisely at noon, central time, ninety-sixth meridian, by an electric current controlled by the standard transmitting clock in the office. This clock is corrected by daily comparisons with the standard Naval Observatory clock by means of electric signals received over the Western Union Telegraph wires. Should the ball fail to drop at 12 o'clock for any cause it is kept in position for five minutes and allowed to come down slowly. The instruments show errors of one-tenth of a second. The time is taken from an observation of the sun made at the Naval Observatory and is transmitted in one-fifth of a second.

time-bargain, s. An engagement entered into with a view to being closed before or at a given time. The subject of these bargains may be any commodity whatever, such as cotton, iron, wool, tobacco, corn, &c., and purchases or sales of these commodities against time are often made. But by far the largest number of time bargains are made in Stock Exchange securities; and are generally mere gambling transactions, carried on from time to time by the mere payment of the difference between the stipulated price and the actual price on the settling-day.

"Time-bargains originated in the practice of closing the bank for six weeks in each quarter for the preparation of the dividends. As no transfer could be made during that period, it became a practice to buy and sell for the opening. The habit, once formed, was extended to other stocks, and as neither stock nor capital were necessary for the conclusion of bargains, it opened the way for a host of needy adventurers, who were not slow to avail themselves of the opportunity of making a gain, while they had nothing to lose."—Bithell: Counting-house Dict.

time-beguiling, a. Making time pass quickly and pleasantly away.

"A time-beguiling ditty, for delight

Of his fond partner, silent in the nest."

Wordsworth: Excursion, bk. vi.

time-detector, s. An instrument for recording the time at which a watchman may be present at different stations on his beat.

time-fuse, s. A fuse which can be so arranged as to explode a charge at a certain determinate interval after the time of its ignition. This is usually effected either by cutting out or off a portion of the fuse or by employing compositions of which given lengths burn at different rates.

time-gun, s. A gun which is fired by electricity at a particular time of day, as on the falling of a time-ball, or as a substitute for it.

time-hallowed, adj. Hallowed or sanctified by age.

"The energetic words

Which a time-hallowed poet hath employ'd."

Wordsworth: Excursion, bk. iv.

time-honored, adj. Honored for a long time; venerable and worthy of honor by reason of antiquity and long continuance; being of a venerable age.

"Herself the solitary scion left

Of a time-honored race." Byron: Dream, 2.

time-keeper, s.

1. A clock, watch, or chronometer.

"The same watch, or time-keeper, which I had carried out in my last voyage."—Cook: Third Voyage, bk. i., ch. i.

2. A person who keeps, marks, regulates, or records the times, as of the departure of conveyances, performances in races, &c., hours worked by workmen, &c.

time-lock, subst. A lock having clock-work attached, which, when wound up and locked, prevents the bolt being withdrawn, even by means of the proper key, until a certain interval of time has elapsed.

time-piece, subst. An instrument for recording time; especially a small clock placed on mantel-pieces, side-tables, &c.

"That warning time-piece never ceased."

Longfellow: Old Clock on the Stairs.

time-pleaser, subst. One who complies with the prevailing opinions, whatever they may be.

"Time-pleasers, flatterers, foes to nobleness,"

Shakesp.: Coriolanus, iii. 1.

time-server, s.

*1. One engaged in serving his time. Not originally conveying the imputation which it does now.

"He is a good time-server that improves the present for God's glory and his own salvation."—Fuller: Holy State, vol. iii., ch. xix.

2. One who acts in accordance with circumstances; one who suits his conduct, opinions, and manners to the times; one who obsequiously complies with the ruling power.

time-serving, a. & s.

A. As adj.: Complying with the times; obsequiously complying with the ruling power.

"In vain the time-serving bishops ranged themselves on the king's side."—Gardiner & Mullinger: Introd. to Eng. Hist., ch. iii.

B. As subst.: An acting conformably to times and seasons; usually an obsequious compliance with the humors of those in power, implying a surrender of one's independence, and sometimes of one's integrity.

"If such, by trimming and time-serving, which are but two words for the same thing, abandon the Church of England, this will produce confusion."—South.

time-servingness, s. The quality or state of being time-serving; a truckling line of conduct.

"Time-servingness and malice."—North: Life of Lord Guilford, i. 2.

Script. Biog.: One of the companions of St. Paul on his missionary travels. Timothy was born either at Lystra or Derbe; his father was a Greek, his mother a Jewess (Acts xvi. 1-2). Both his mother, Eunice, and his grandmother, Lois, were Christians (2 Tim. i. 5), having probably been converted by St. Paul on his first missionary tour through Lycaonia (Acts xiv. 6). Hence Timothy early knew the [Jewish] scriptures, probably with Christian interpretations (2 Tim. iii. 15); but his actual conversion seems to have been effected through the instrumentality of St. Paul, if, indeed, this be the meaning of the phrase "my own son in the faith" (1 Tim. i. 2). His constitution was feeble, sensitive, with a certain tendency to asceticism, yet not free from temptation to "youthful lusts" (2 Tim. ii. 22). He was strongly recommended to St. Paul by the Christians at Lystra and Iconium. The apostle therefore chose him as missionary colleague, and had him circumcised for the sake of facilitating his work among the Jews (Acts xvi. 3). He thoroughly gained the confidence and affection of St. Paul, and was with him in Macedonia and Corinth (A. D. 52-53; Acts xvii. 14, xviii. 5; 1 Thess. i. 1), and at Ephesus, from which he was despatched for special duty to Corinth (A. D. 55-56; 1 Cor. iv. 17, xvi. 10). Returning, he was with St. Paul when the second epistle to the Corinthians and that to the Romans were penned (2 Cor. i. 1; Rom. xvi. 21), as also when he passed through Asia Minor prior to his arrest (A. D. 57-58; Acts xx. 4), and during his imprisonment at Rome (A. D. 61-63; Col. i. 1; Phil. i. 1). Probably about A. D. 64 he was left in charge of the Ephesian church. In Heb. xiii. 23 his own imprisonment and liberation are recorded. Tradition makes him ultimately suffer martyrdom, either in A. D. 96 or in A. D. 109.

¶ (1) The First Epistle of Paul the Apostle to Timothy:

New Test. Canon.: An epistle addressed by St. Paul to Timothy. Some persons in the Ephesian church had taught, or appeared disposed to teach, a doctrine different from that of the apostle. Paul therefore, on departing from Macedonia, left Timothy behind to restrain these false teachers (1 Tim. i. 3-7), pretentious men too much given to profitless "fables and endless genealogies" (verse 4). Paul charged Timothy to preach the gospel, defining it as a "faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptance, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners" (i. 5-20). Paul then commends prayer (ii. 1-8), defines the position of women in the Christian church (9-15), explains the duties of a bishop (iii. 1-7), and of a deacon and his wife (iii. 8-13), and, expressing the hope that he soon may see Timothy (iii. 14), he gives him personal counsel (15), presents as beyond controversy the mystery (hidden thing) of godliness (16), predicts by the Spirit perilous times (iv. 1-4), adds fresh injunctions to his younger colleague (v.-vi), explaining what his action should be toward elderly and younger men, and elder and Younger women (v. 1-16), the Christian functionaries called elders (17), slaves (vi. 1-2), the rich (17-19), and what should be his conduct in the office which he held in trust (20-21). Eusebius summed up the verdict of Christian antiquity in placing the first epistle to Timothy among the Homologoumena. Modern rationalistic critics, from Schmidt and Schleiermacher to Renan, have denied its authenticity, of which, however, there have been powerful defenders. Various dates have been assigned it; one of the most probable is A. D. 56.

(2) The Second Epistle of Paul the Apostle to Timothy:

New Test. Canon: An epistle written by St. Paul after he had become a prisoner (i. 8) in Rome (17), in bonds (ii. 9), who had been at least once judicially examined and been required to make his "answer" (iv. 16), a crisis which, however, ended in his being "delivered out of the mouth of the lion" [Nero (?)] (iv. 17). Commencing by expressing his love for Timothy and his earnest desire to see him (i. 1-5), he exhorts him to steadfastness in the faith (6-18), to hardness and unworldliness (ii. 1-7), to the avoidance of frivolous and entangling questions, to purity (ii. 8-23), and to meekness under provocation (24-26). His counsels are all the more fervent that many have deserted him for heresy or the world (i. 15, ii. 17, 18, iv. 10); and he foresaw that a general impatience of sound doctrine was destined to appear (iii. 1-17, iv. 1-4). A certain air of sadness pervades the epistle, but the writer looks forward to his probably near martyrdom in tranquil trust in his Redeemer whom he had served so long and so well (iv. 6-8). He closes with sundry greetings and with the benediction. The evidence for the authenticity of the epistle is the same as that for the previous letter. Two dates assigned it are A. D. 63, and July or August A. D. 65. It seems to have been the last of St. Paul's epistles.

Timothy-grass, s.

Botany: Phleum pratense. So called because brought from New York by a Mr. Timothy Hanson, and introduced by him into Carolina and thence into England. (Prior.) Loudon states that the date was about 1780; but W. Ellis, writing in 1750, calls it St. Timothy-grass and St. Timothy-seed. (Britten & Holland.)

tīm'-ōūs, a. [TIMEOUS.]

tīm'-ōūs-lŷ, adv. [Eng. timous; -ly.] In time; timeously, betimes.

tīm-whis'-keŷ, s. [Etym. doubtful.] A light one-horse chaise without a head.

"It is not like the difference between . . . a whiskey and a tim-whiskey, that is to say, no difference at all."—Southey: The Doctor, interch. xiv.

tin, s. & a. [A. S. tin; cogn. with Dut., Icel., & Dan. tin; Sw. tenn; Ger. zinn. The Wel. ystaen; Corn. stean; Bret. stéan; Ir. stan, and Fr. étain are from Lat. stagnum, stannum=tin.]

A. As substantive:

1. Ordinary Language:

1. Literally:

(1) In the same sense as II. 1.

(2) Thin plates of iron covered with tin. [TIN-PLATE.]

2. Fig.: A slang term for money.

"And is this all! And I have seen the whole,

Cathedral, chapel, nunnery, and graves!

'Tis scanty worth the tin, upon my soul."

Blackie: Lays of Highlands and Islands, p. 30.

II. Technically:

1. Chem.: Stannum. A tetrad metallic element, Symb. Sn; at. wt. 118; specific gravity, 7.28; found in the state of oxide in tin-stone, in Cornwall, and also in Saxony, Bohemia, and Malacca. To obtain the metal, the ore is first crushed to a powder, washed to free it from earthy impurities, and roasted in a reverberatory furnace to expel sulphur and arsenic. It is then strongly heated with coal or charcoal, and the metal thus obtained cast into blocks. When pure it is a white metal with a high metallic luster, is soft and malleable, and may be beaten into thin leaves (tin-foil). At a temperature of 200° it becomes brittle, at 228° it fuses, and when raised to a white heat it enters into ebullition, and burns with a brilliant white light. When rubbed, it evolves a peculiar odor, and when bent backward and forward emits a peculiar crackling noise. It dissolves in hydrochloric, nitric, and sulphuric acids. Tin forms two well-defined classes of compounds, viz., the stannous, in which it is bivalent, and the stannic, in which it is quadrivalent. It also forms an intermediate class called stannoso-stannic compounds.

2. History & Comm.: The tin-mines of Cornwall have been worked from a very remote period. The Phœnicians probably obtained the metal from the Scilly Isles, the Romans did so from Spain. Tin has been discovered in Pennsylvania, Missouri, California, Dakota, and other States of the Union, but not in sufficient quantities to tempt capital to engage in mining it, with the exception of Dakota, where the Illinois Steel Mill Company have large interests. The chief tin-producing countries of the world are the following, arranged in the order of importance: England, about 10,000 tons a year; Malacca, 8,500 tons; Australia, 6,000 tons; Banca, 4,000 tons; and Billiton, 3,000 tons. The two last-named places are islands of the Dutch East Indies. Tin is much used as a covering to other metals, as iron and copper. [WHITE-IRON, TIN-FOIL.]

3. Min.: Stated to have been found in Siberia with gold, and also in Bolivia; but it is still a doubtful native element.

4. Pharm.: Tin-salts have been experimentally administered, though rarely, in some nervous affections, as epilepsy and chorea. By the Hindoo native doctors they are given chiefly for urinary affections.

B. As adj.: Made of tin; as, a tin pot, a tin canister, &c.

¶ Tin-ore=Cassiterite, Stannine; tin-oxide and tin-pyrites=Stannine; tin-stone=Cassiterite.

tin-dichloride, s.

Chem.: SnCl₂. Stannous chloride. A gray resinous-looking substance, obtained in the anhydrous state by distilling a mixture of calomel and powdered tin. It is fusible below redness, and volatile at a higher temperature.

tin-dioxide, s.

Chem.: SnO₂. Stannic oxide. A white amorphous powder prepared by heating tin, or tin monoxide, in contact with air. It is very insoluble, not being attacked by acids even in the concentrated state.

tin-glass, *tin-glasse, s.

*1. An old name for pewter or solder.

2. The glassmakers' name for bismuth.

tin-glaze, s.

Pottery: An opaque glaze or enamel, having oxide of tin as a basis, used upon majolica-ware and other fine pottery.

tin-liquor, s. A dyer's solution of tin, digested in hydrochloric and nitric acids, with an addition of salt.

tin-monoxide, s.

Chemistry: SnO. Stannous oxide. A dense black powder prepared by heating stannous oxalate out of contact with air. It is permanent in the air, but when touched with a red-hot wire takes fire and burns like tinder.

tin-mordant, s. The same as TIN-LIQUOR (q. v.).

tin-ore, s. The ore of tin. [TIN, s.]

tin-penny, s. A customary duty in England, formerly paid to the tithingmen for liberty to dig in tin mines.

tin-pot, s. The first of the set of baths in which sheet-iron is dipped for tinning.

tin-salt, s.

Chem.: SnCl₂.2H₂O. The hydrated chloride of tin produced by dissolving tin in hot hydrochloric acid. It crystallizes in needles, freely soluble in water, and is extensively used as a mordant in dyeing and calico-printing.

tin-saw, s.

Bricklay.: A saw used by bricklayers for cutting kerfs in bricks in order to render them more readily dressed by the ax which hews them into shape for the skew or gauged work, dome, or niche for which they are destined.

tin-scrap, s. Clippings or scraps made in the manufacture of tin-ware. It consists of iron plate, partially alloyed, and also coated with tin, the amount of the latter varying from three to five per cent. In inferior wares the tin is itself debased with lead.

tin-sesquioxide, s.

Chem.: Sn₂O₃. A slimy substance obtained by the action of ferric oxide on stannous chloride. It is soluble in hydrochloric acid and in ammonia.

tin-smith, s. One who makes articles of tin or tin-plate.

tin-tack, s. A tack dipped in melted tin.

tin-tetrachloride, s.

Chem.: SnCl₄. Stannic chloride. A thin, colorless, mobile liquid obtained by distilling a mixture of powdered tin and corrosive sublimate. It boils at 120°, fumes in the air, and, when mixed with water, solidifies to a soft mass called butter of tin.

tin-trichloride, s.

Chem.: SnCl₃. Stannoso-stannic chloride. Produced by dissolving tin sesquioxide in hydrochloric acid. It is only known in solution, and acts like a mixture of dichloride and tetrachloride.

tin-type, s. A photograph taken on a tinned plate; a stannotype or ferrotype.

tĩ-nãm'-i-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. tinam(us); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Ornithology: A family of Game Birds, with nine genera and thirty-nine species. Bill straight, flattened, with membrane at base, nostrils large; wings short and concave, toes long. They form a very remarkable family, with the general appearance of partridges or hemipodes, but with the tail very small or entirely wanting. They differ greatly in their organization from any of the Old World Gallinæ, and approach, in some respects, the Ostriches. They are very terrestrial in their habits, frequenting the forests, open plains, and mountains of the Neotropical region, from Patagonia and Chili to Mexico, but are absent from the Antilles. Their coloring is very sober and protective, as is the case with so many ground-birds, and they are seldom adorned with crests or other ornamental plumes, so prevalent in the order to which they belong. (Wallace.)

tĩn'-a-môu, s. [Native name.]

Ornith.: Any individual of the family Tinamidæ (q. v.).

tĩn'-a-mūs, s. [Latinized from tinamou (q. v.).]

"The lark that tirralirra chants,
With hey! with hey! the thrush and the jay."
Shakesp.: Winter's Tale, iv. 2.

tir'-rēt, s. [Etym. doubtful.]

Her.: A manacle.

tir'-rit, s. [A word of no derivation.] Fright, terror.

"Here's a goodly tumult! I'll forswear keeping house, before I'll be to these tirrits and frights."—Shakesp.: Henry IV., Pt. II., ii. 4.

tir'-ri-vlēg, s. pl. [Cf. tirr.] Tantrums; burst of passion or ill-humor. (Scotch.)

"For that matter when he wasna in ane o' his tirrivies."—Scott: Waverley, ch. lxix.

tir'-wit, s. [From the cry of the bird.] The lapwing.

tis, v. [See def.] A common contraction of it is.

tī'-san, s. [PTISAN.]

tī'-sar, s. [Fr.]

Glass-manuf.: The fireplace at the side of, and heating the annealing arch of, the plate-glass furnace.

tis'-ic, tis'-ic-al, a. [PHTHISIC, PHTHISICAL.]

tis'-ick-ŷ, a. [Eng. tisic; -y.] Consumptive, phthisical.

Tis'-ri, s. [Heb. Thishri, from an obsolete root signifying to begin.]

Jewish Calendar: The first month of the civil, and the seventh of the ecclesiastical year. It corresponded to part of our September and October. The Great Day of Atonement and the Feast of Tabernacles fell within its limits. Called in 1 Kings viii. 2, Ethanim (=streaming rivers), because the rivers, swelled by the autumnal rains, were then in flood. The name tisri occurs in the Palmyrene inscriptions, and was probably not confined to the Jews.

tis'-sue (ss as sh), s. [O. F. tissu=a ribbon, fillet, or head-band of wove, stuff; prop. pa. par. of tistre (Fr. tisser)=to weave, from Lat. texo.] [TEXT.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Literally:

(1) Tissue-paper (q. v.).

(2) A very fine transparent silk stuff used for veils; white or colored. It was formerly interwoven with gold or silver threads and embossed with figures.

(3) Cloth interwoven with gold.

"The taste for the spices, the tissues, and the jewels of the East became stronger day by day."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xviii.

2. Fig.: A connected series; a concatenation; as, The whole story is a tissue of falsehoods.

II. Technically:

1. Histology: A set of cells modified for the performance of a special function; the fabric of which the organs of plants and animals are composed. The structure of tissues, with very few exceptions, is imperceptible to the unassisted eye, and requires the aid of the microscope for its resolution. Tissues which are absent from plants occur in animals; these are called Animal Tissues, and have a relation to movement or to sensation, as the muscles and nerves. But plants preserve, protect, and sustain themselves, and the corresponding tissues in animals are spoken of as the Vegetable Tissues; of this kind are epithelium and bone. Tissues always present the same general arrangement in the same organism, but are combined in different ways in different organisms. In the lower forms of life, whether animal or vegetable, the distinctions between tissues become less and less obvious, and there are organisms so extremely simple that the tissue of their bodies is of a uniform cellular character.

(1) Animal: The term tissue is used in dealing with (a) the structure of organs, which are composed of various tissues; and (b) specially of the component parts of organs. In the first and wider sense, the anatomical individual is made up of osseous tissue, or bone; muscular tissue, or flesh; adipose tissue, or fat; cartilaginous tissue, or gristle; connective tissue, serving to bind the whole together; and pigmentary tissue, or coloring matter. In dealing with animal tissues in the strict sense, histological analysis shows them to be much more differentiated and elaborate in structure than those of plants. They may be divided into: (a) Epithelium, consisting of nucleated protoplasmic cells, forming continuous masses, either arranged in a single layer, or stratified and forming several superimposed layers. The lining of the tubes and alveoli of secreting and excreting glands, and the sensory or terminal parts of the organs of sense consist of epithelium. (b) Connective Tissue, a name applied to a variety of tissues developed from the same embryonal element, serving more or less as framework or connecting substance for nervous, muscular, glandular and vascular tissues. In the embryo and in the growing condition one may be changed into the other, and in the adult they gradually shade off one into the other. These tissues are divided into three groups, in all of which the ground substance, matrix, or intercellular substance, is distinguished from the cells embedded therein: (i) Fibrous connective tissue, consisting of microscopic, band-like, or cylindrical bundles of exceedingly fine homogeneous fibrils, sometimes aggregated in groups, and held together by an albuminous, semi-fluid cement substance called globulin. (ii) Cartilage, consisting of a firm ground-substance with cells imbedded therein. Cartilage may be Hyaline, having the ground-substance firm and resembling ground-glass; Fibrous, or Fibro-Cartilage, consisting of fibrous connective tissue arranged in bundles, and these again in layers; and Yellow, Elastic, or Reticular, having the ground work permeated by dense networks of elastic fibrils. (iii) Bone and Dentine, both developed from transformed embryonal connective tissue. (c) Muscular tissue: (i) Non-striated, consisting of nucleated cells, contractile in one definite direction, becoming shorter and thicker during contraction. (ii) Striated, composed of extremely long more or less cylindrical fibers, held together by bundles of fibrous connective tissue so as to form larger or smaller bundles; these again are aggregated together by stronger bands and septa of fibrous connective tissue, and these into the fascicles or divisions of an anatomical muscle. (d) Nervous, consisting of bundles of nerve-fibers held together by fibrous connective tissue, which carries the blood-vessels supplying the nerve trunk, a plexus of lymphatics, groups of fat cells, and sometimes numerous plasma cells.

(2) Vegetable: Two forms of aggregations of cells, called generally Cellular Tissue, may be distinguished, according to the form and relative position of the cells which compose them: (a) Parenchyma (Areolar, Utricular, or Vesicular Tissue), in which thin-walled cells, of a diameter nearly equal in all directions, are united to one another by broad surfaces; and (b) Prosenchyma, in which the cells are pointed at both ends, and are much longer than they are broad. When the walls of the cells are much thickened, the tissue is called sclerenchyma; this may be either parenchymatous or prosenchymatous, according to the form of the cells. When the transverse walls of a row of super-imposed cells are absorbed or perforated, so that they coalesce and form tubes or vessels, the tissue is said to be vascular. When all the cells have ceased to divide, and have assumed their definite form, the tissue is called permanent; when, on the contrary, the cells are still dividing, it is called generating tissue. When several different tissues occur in one plant, as in all the higher plants, they are arranged into systems. Three such systems of tissues are usually met with: (1) The epidermal, which covers the exterior of the plant, and usually consists of a single layer of cells; (2) the fibro-vascular, which traverses the body of the plant in the form of bundles, and is characterized by the presence of tubes and vessels, and of long, pointed, prosenchymatous cells—the Wood-fibers; (3) the fundamental tissue, which fills up the rest of the space, and consists principally of parenchyma.

2. Entom.: A European geometer moth, Scotosia dubitata. The fore wings have numerous transverse wavy lines; the larva feeds on buckthorn.

tissue-paper, s. A very thin gauze-like paper made of several sizes, and used for the protection of engravings, and for wrapping fine and delicate articles.

tis'-sue (ss as sh), v. t. [TISSUE, s.] To form tissue of, to interweave, to variegate.

tis'-sued (ss as sh), pa. par. or a. [TISSUE, v.]

1. Variegated.

"Playing with thy vesture's tissued flowers."
Cowper: On my Mother's Picture.

2. Dressed in or adorned with tissue.
